The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emily Louisa Spicer, widow of Commodore William F. Spicer, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendments:

In line 4, strike out the words "place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name" and insert "increase the pension."

In line 8, strike out the words "a pension" and insert the words "at the rate."

In line 9, insert the words "in lieu of the pension now received by her."

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Emily Louisa Spicer, widow of Commodore William F. Spicer, late of the United States Navy, and pay her at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now received by her.

Mr. PETERS. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. PETERS. I withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

Mr. PRICE. I want to antagonize that bill and to vote against it so far as to send it into the House when there is a quorum to vote on it. I desire to do this in consistency with the declaration I have made and other gentlemen have indorsed, that this whole system of increasing pensions according to rank is vicious.

Mr. MORRILL. You can do that when we get back into the House.

Mr. PRICE. I only desire that the bill shall not pass through the committee without an agreement that there shall be a vote in a full House. I do not wish the bill to pass without an opportunity being given to the majority of the House to act upon it.

The amendments recommended by the committee were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. PRICE. Before voting upon that question, I desire to say that I do not want a vote taken in that way unless upon the agreement that the bill shall not be put upon its passage until we have a quorum.

Mr. MORRILL. That is the understanding.

Mr. PRICE. Very well; with that agreement I will let it take its course.

RINALDO R. SOMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5284) granting a pension to Rinaldo R. Somes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rinaldo R. Somes, late a lieutenant of Company I, Fifth New Hampshire Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SALLIE ANN BRADLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5394) granting a pension to Sallie Ann Bradley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sally Ann Bradley, widow of Thomas J. Bradley, late a private in Company D, Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CORNELIA W. ELLIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1782) granting a pension to Cornelia W. Ellis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Cornelia W. Ellis, widow of Edmund C. Ellis, late of the United States Navy, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY ANN MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1816) granting a pension to Mary Ann Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to put the name of Mary Ann Miller, widow of Hamilton Miller, late a private in Company F, Third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended amending the bill by striking out in lines 6 and 7 the words "at the rate of $8 a month" and inserting the words "subject to the provisions of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL JACKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4219) granting a pension to Daniel Jacks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of tne Interior is authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Daniel Jacks, late of Company E, United States Artillery.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended amending the last line of the bill, so as to make it read "of Company E, Second United States Artillery."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL KAIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1821) granting a pension to Daniel Kain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel Kain, late a private in Company K, Twenty-seventh Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MINERVA T. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4111) granting a pension to Minerva T. Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Minerva T. Thompson, widow of Joseph Thompson, deceased, late a private in Company D of the Sixth Regiment of Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, who died of disease contracted while in the service, and to pay her the sum of $8 per month from the date of the death of her late husband, being the 24th day of April, 1868, so long as she shall remain the widow of said deceased soldier; and $2 additional per month for her minor child Joseph Alexander Thompson, from the 25th day of July, 1866; and also $2 additional per month for her minor child Hugh D. Thompson, from the date of his birth, being the 11th day of April, 1867, until said minor children each arrived at or shall arrive at the age of sixteen years.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported an amendment striking out all after the word "volunteers," in line 8, to the end of the bill.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I got a point from the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELY]. [Laughter.] This is a case somewhat analogous to the one which was under consideration when he spoke a while ago, and I want to say, in continuation of his remarks, that if the application was made for a pension within the time prescribed by law and the bureau should have granted the pension, but has failed to do so, and the claimant is forced to come here, I can not see any reason why he should be deprived of arrears. This House is like a court of equity. The claimants come here because the law, on account of its universality, can not grant them relief.

The claims that are passed by this House ought to be as strong in equity as the claims that are allowed by the Pension Bureau. Because of the absence of certain kinds of proof required by law in this case of Minerva Thompson her claim was rejected, and now, after she has been for years an applicant before the Department, seeking to establish her claim, she is informed that it has been rejected, and she comes to this House and makes proof which ought, in my opinion, to have established her claim before the Pension Bureau. If it did not, it was because the law required a peculiar kind of proof which she happened to be unable to adduce, and now, an old woman, after having claimed a pension for years, she is offered a pittance of $8 a month from the date of the passage of this bill, while other persons who exercised no more diligence than she did, but who were more fortunate in being able to supply the peculiar proof required by the Pension Bureau, get not only the $8 a month, but in addition the gratuity given by act of Congress in the form of arrears of pension.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I desire to antagonize this amendment formally, because if I should succeed in getting it beaten the bill might be beaten also. [Laughter.] Therefore I feel that, having said this much, I had better perhaps let the committee vote upon the question.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARIA K. RITTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5693) for the relief of Maria K. Ritter.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that this bill be passed over informally until a hearing can be had before the Commissioner of Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that order will be made. There was no objection.

MARY JANE CONRAD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 944) for the relief of Mary Jane Conrad.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Jane Conrad, widow of James Conrad, deceased, late of Maysville, in the State of Kentucky, formerly of the special service, war of 1861.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the discussion which we have had in the House upon the bill for pensioning certain militiamen, I merely wish to call attention to the fact that in this case the soldier whose widow it is proposed to pension was a member of the Kentucky State militia. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. TAULBEE. While that is true, the company to which this militiaman belonged was at the time under the command of General William Nelson, a general of the Union Army, and was killed during an engagement with confederate soldiers.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish merely to say that I commend the committee for its action in reporting this bill to pension the widow of a member of the Kentucky State militia.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that in Kentucky, Missouri, and several other States of this Union when the great struggle was making for the life of this nation all the males who were of age went into the army on the one side or the other—those of rich families generally going into the confederate army and those who were poor into the Union Army. A few boys and old men were left at home to take care of the women, to plough, to raise corn, and keep the women and children from starving. When Morgan came to Kentucky, when Pegram came to Kentucky, when Price went to Missouri these boys who had staid at home came forward in many cases to assist in the defense of their State. I remember a notable case in the State of Kentucky when boys of sixteen and seventeen years left their plows standing in the furrow and joined the militia. In one battle, which I remember, with General Pegram, there were under my command two brothers—one of them a member of my division, while the other had come from the plow that morning to fight for his country. He came at the call of the provisional governor, because the regular governor of the State refused to muster soldiers in. He came and put himself in the ranks; and I placed him right by the side of his older brother. I thought it best for the militia and the regular trained troops to stand together in that fight, for it was a terrible fight.

In that battle both those boys were shot. One had his right leg broken, the other had both legs broken. The younger boy who had that morning left his plow standing in the furrow lay there a cripple; both legs had to be amputated. I sent both home. I thought myself justified in doing so, because I had no place to take care of them. One of them is drawing a pension. The other, because he did not make his application in time under the law, which has now expired, has never drawn a pension. He is poor; the "wolf is at the door." That plow stood in the furrow till it rotted, for there was nobody else to take it. I think if there ever was a righteous measure it is that which proposes to allow pensions to these militiamen who came from their homes and burned with patriotism, all alive to the interests of their country, ready to shed their blood and lay down their lives for the country they loved. [Applause.]

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELEANOR FOUST.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5100) granting a pension to Eleanor Foust.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to rerate the pension of Samuel Frost, late a lieutenant of Company F, Eighty-fourth Illinois Regiment, and pay him a pension of —— dollars per month, in lieu of the pension now granted him.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Samuel Frost."

Strike out the word "rerate" and insert the word "increase;" also, in line 6, before the word dollars, insert the words "twenty-four," so it will read, "to increase the pension of Samuel Frost, late a lieutenant of Company F, Eighty-fourth Illinois Regiment, and pay him a pension of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension now granted him."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I should like to have some reason for thus increasing the pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is hardly necessary. If some member on the floor will state the reason for it——

Mr. NEECE. I will state for the benefit of the committee, Mr. Chairman, that this man was wounded in the ankle at the battle or Stone River. He is pensioned for that wound, but not for the gangrene which has got into his system and prevented the wound from healing. That gangrene has gone on to such extent his whole system has become poisoned by it. His eyelids are constantly dropping, and because of this general debility the committee were of the opinion his pension should be increased as recommended by the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not wish to object, but merely to know why the surgeons did not properly rate this pensioner in the first instance.

Mr. NEECE. Simply because the medical board have not been able to trace the gangrenous poison to the wound. The trouble seems to be muscular, as indicated by the falling of the eyelids. His family and local physicians, however, are satisfied the wound was the cause of the gangrene.

Mr. WOLFORD. What is the increase which is proposed?

Mr. NEECE. From $15 to $24 a month.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRY M'ELHINNY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 429) granting a pension to Harry McElhinny.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "at the rate of $8 per month" and in lieu thereof insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RACHEL W. HEARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4031) granting a pension to Rachel W. Heard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rachel W. Heard, widow of Nathan Heard, a second lieutenant in the service of the United States in the war of 1812, and in service at or near Boston with the Seventh Division Worcester Artillery from September 14, 1814, to October 31, 1814.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the following words: "And in service at or near Boston with the Seventh Division Worcester Artillery from September 14, 1814, to October 31, 1814.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISABELLA J. RAMSDELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5022) increasing the pension of Isabella J. Ramsdell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the rate of pension of Isabella J. Ramsdell, widow of David D. Ramsdell, who for over thirty years was a marine in the United States service, to $30 per month, and that the same begin at the death of her said husband, deducting therefrom the amount she has received under act of Congress approved July 1, 1884.

Mr. PERKINS. Let us have the report read in this case.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) was read, as follows:

This case was before the Committee on Pensions during the Forty-sixth Congress, also during the Forty-eighth Congress, and favorable reports were made thereon, which your committee is satisfied is a correct statement of facts, and therefore adopt the report made to the Forty-eighth Congress as their report. It further appears by the petition of Isabella J. Ramsdell, filed during the present session, that she is destitute and in a crippled condition, caused by the nursing and lifting her husband, who was entirely helpless during his two years' confinement in hospital prior to his death. The committee regard this as a specially meritorious case, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The following are the reports made to the Forty-eighth Congress and Forty-sixth Congress:

[House Report No. 349, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Isabella J. Ramsdell, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

The committee find, from the petition and papers filed in the original pension claim, that the petitioner is the widow of David D. Ramsdell, who was a member of the United States Marine Corps for thirty-one years eleven months and eleven days, who, having been discharged the service, was admitted to a pension, and subsequently was admitted to the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia as a beneficiary. His history will appear more fully from the following letter, granting him admission to the institution above named:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., October 14, 1876.

SIR: Referring to your application of the 12th instant, and the Fourth Auditor having verified your services as seaman and marine thirty-one years eleven months and eleven days in the Navy, a permit is herewith granted for your admission to the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, which please find inclosed. The governor of the asylum has been notified accordingly, and upon presenting yourself with this permit and the delivery of your pension certificate will receive you as a beneficiary of the institution. Inclosed also is your pension certificate.

Respectfully,

J. C. HOWELL, Chief of Bureau.

DAVID D. RAMSDELL,
United States Marines.

It further appears in evidence that this pensioner, David D. Ramsdell, died in the Naval Asylum hospital at Philadelphia on the 24th day of September, 1877, of disease contracted in the service.

The petitioner has minor children, and is destitute.

In view of the fact that the pensioner, David D. Ramsdell, died of disease caused by the service, and of his long service as a marine, your committee believe that his widow, Isabella J. Ramsdell, is a proper person to be placed on the pension-rolls.

[House Report No. 1189, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Isabella J. Ramsdell, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

We find from the petition and the papers filed in the original pension claim that the petitioner is the widow of David D. Ramsdell, who was a member of the United States Marine Corps for more than thirty years, who having been discharged the service was admitted to pension, and subsequently was admitted to the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia as a beneficiary. His history will more fully appear from the following letter granting him admission to the institution above named:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., October 14, 1876.

SIR: Referring to your application of the 12th instant, and the Fourth Auditor having verified your service as seaman and marine thirty-one years eleven months and eleven days in the Navy, a permit is herewith granted for your admission to the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, which please find inclosed. The governor of the asylum has been notified accordingly, and upon presenting yourself with this permit and the delivery of your pension certificate will receive you as a beneficiary of the institution. Inclosed also is your pension certificate.

Respectfully,

J. C. HOWELL, Chief of Bureau.

DAVID D. RAMSDELL,
United States Marines.

It further appears in evidence that this pensioner died in the Naval Asylum hospital at Philadelphia on the 24th day of September, 1877, the cause of his death being paralysis, superinduced by the arduous service he had rendered his country in his many enlistments.

The petitioner made application for pension January 15, 1878, which was rejected February 4, 1878, on the ground that "sailor died out of service subsequent to March 4, 1861, of disease contracted prior to March 4, 1861." The petitioner has minor children and is destitute.

Your committee believe that the cause of death of the pensioner was laid while in the service and that it was superinduced thereby; and, in view of that fact, and in consideration of the long service of the sailor and marine, we deem the petitioner a proper person to be admitted to the pension-roll as his widow.

We therefore report favorably upon her prayer, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill granting a pension to Isabella J. Ramsdell.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt from the reading of the report that this lady should be pensioned; but I do not know any reason, nor does the report disclose any, why an exception should be made in her favor and arrears be granted to her. If the gentleman will permit the bill to be made to conform to the general practice of the House in this respect there will be no objection to its passage.

I understand it is giving a larger pension than is ordinarily given to widows, and at the same time gives a pension to date back from her husband's death.

Mr. BRADY. The gentleman will see, by reference to the report which has just been read, that this is a peculiarly strong and meritorious case. This lady for two years nursed her husband during his illness, and spent all of her means to that end, and is now in a helpless condition, being sick and disabled on account of this care of her husband.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood from the reading of the report that her husband had been admitted to some hospital.

Mr. BRADY. That is true, but she followed him there, and it was there that she nursed him. It is true, also, that on account of that service, attending to him, helping to lift him and performing other duties in connection with nursing for a period of two years, she has become so afflicted that she is perfectly helpless as well as destitute. She already receives a pension under a special act of Congress of $8 a month. She also has, according to that report, as the gentleman will observe, minor children who are dependent upon her, and it is a case that has been considered by the committee in every way worthy of special action of Congress. The bill itself grants a pension of $30 a month, but the other pension to which she is now entitled will be deducted from that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to strike out of the bill all after the word "month," in the seventh line.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the bill the words "and that the same begin at the death of her husband, deducting therefrom the amount she has received under act of Congress approved July 1, 1884."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do this because it has been the uniform custom of the committee not to grant arrears, and it is a custom that should be observed. I see no reason for making an exception in this case.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, there are two objections to this bill to my mind. One has been already stated, which is that the bill carries arrears. The other is that I see nothing in the report, and I speak of it without any knowledge of the facts, at all to warrant a pension of $30 a month. I have in my own district many very meritorious cases where, judging by the report in this case, the applicant should receive $25, $30, or even $50 a month; and I do not understand that it has been the policy of Congress, certainly there is no law to that effect, to grant pensions of this size under these circumstances.

Upon the very face of this bill it is apparent that this party was not by law entitled to a pension at all. It appears that the Pension Office, and we all know the breadth and generosity, if you please, of the examinations that obtain in the office——

Mr. BRADY. I think to the contrary.

Mr. WILLIS. And we all know that the evidence there is entirely ex parte and how loose that kind of evidence is; and if under these circumstances, if I understand the report correctly, this party was unable even by ex parte evidence to secure a pension, I do not see how we can in justice not only grant it here but grant such an increase as this. The bill proposes not only to continue the pension already in force, to which of course we have no objection, but to extend it to double, even to quadruple it. Is that proper? How can we do that and justify ourselves to our own claimants? If there is a proposition here to bring in a general bill, let us bring it in and discuss it upon its merits; but I do submit that by singling out a special case here, making an exception of it, giving a larger pension than others are allowed to receive, we create dissatisfaction and discontent among the persons who have similar bills pending; it brings an undue pressure upon Congress for the passage of such bills, and we place ourselves and every member of the House at a great disadvantage to our constituents; because, Mr. Chairman, I can not go to my worthy constituents, who are suffering, and whose cases are just as good as these, and tell them I can not get a pension for them of $25 a month, for they immediately answer, "Why, by a bill number so-and-so Mrs. So-and-so is receiving just such a pension," and I am prevented from giving that explanation of my failure I otherwise could give. I repeat, it puts every member at a disadvantage. I do protest, therefore, against the passage of bills of this character increasing pensions in such cases. If we are to legislate in this manner let us increase them in all cases. Let us pass a bill like that we recently passed and for which I voted, increasing all the pensions of widows as a class. If there are special particular reasons that exist in this case for increasing so largely as this increases a pension, which can only be increased by a special act of Congress and not by the action of the Department, I have not yet heard them stated.

I make these remarks in the interest of other pensioners and as a protection for myself when I am called on to explain to my own worthy suffering pensioners why their pensions are not increased.

Mr. BRADY. I have no desire to take up the time of the committee in an elaborate discussion of this case; but I am quite sure that the gentleman who has just taken his seat does not fully understand its merits.

In the first place, I beg to differ with the gentleman as to the rulings of the Pension Department in these pension cases. My experience has been, and I believe it will be generally conceded, that the rulings of the Pension Department have been harsh and severe, and that they have been in the habit of rejecting cases worthy in every respect on mere technicalities.

In regard to this case, here is a man who served in the Marine Corps with a splendid record for nearly thirty-two years. By order of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks he was placed in a Government hospital and remained there for nearly two years, and instead of the Government nursing him his wife nursed him. He being a heavy man, she became crippled and disabled in lifting him and spent her means. On account of that servitude as a nurse and attending to her husband she has become physically unable to perform any duty or work whereby she can earn a living, and she has two children in a destitute condition.

I am opposed to establishing precedents by granting pensions except in cases peculiarly meritorious; but I can not conceive of a case more worthy of favorable action than the one I have presented.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What pension is this claimant receiving now?

Mr. BRADY. Eight dollars a month and $2 for each of her minor children.

Mr. BUCHANAN. By special act?

Mr. BRADY. Yes, sir; by special act of Congress.

Mr. RICE. I was not aware this bill was on the Calendar, or that this case was before the House or the committee. But when the original claim for the pension which this lady is now receiving was before the House I became informed of the character of the woman and of the justice of her claim. As the gentleman from Virginia has said, this is not an ordinary case. It is a case where the husband spent a generation, or a time equal to a generation nearly, in the service of the country, and he lost his health, became entirely crippled and broken down, and went to the hospital to die, and was there nursed by this woman, his wife, whom I saw at that time, and whom I know to be a worthy and meritorious woman. She has also lost her health. She is a woman who has been enabled to live with tolerable comfort until the death of her husband, when her resources all went, and she is now destitute and dependent upon her pension and upon her friends.

I do not believe my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] would have any difficulty in explaining to his constituents his vote making a somewhat exceptional case of this infirm and broken-down widow of a man who gave not two or three months or two or three years but a lifetime to the service of his country, and whose widow is now left in the circumstances under which this petitioner comes and asks for this bill which the committee most properly, as it seems to me, have seen fit to recommend favorably in her behalf.

Mr. MATSON. I am very loath, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the recommendation of the Committee on Pensions, and I do it in no spirit of criticism, but because I think this would be a very bad precedent. The proposition of this bill is to increase this woman's pension because of her disability. Now it seems to me that is a field which this Congress can not afford to enter upon. Her pension is to be increased because she is disabled. No law has ever recognized that principle at all. Widows are pensioned because of the death of their husbands, and it seems this widow had to come to Congress to get a pension at all.

Mr. BRADY. She was disabled in nursing her husband in hospital.

Mr. MATSON. It makes no difference how the disability occurred. Any disability not the result of some vice would be quite as meritorious so far as her title to a pension is concerned as that. The nursing of her husband was only the discharge of her duty as a wife. I think Congress can not afford to enter upon this field. And she has been the beneficiary of Congress already. The original pension was given to her as a matter of grace. She could not get it through the ordinary channel and had to come to Congress in order to get it. I think this bill should not pass. There is only one safe rule for Congress to be guided by, and that is to treat all these people as nearly alike as you can. That is the only possible way to get justice. Even then, perhaps, exact justice will not be done; but you come near it by following that sort of principle.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman who has this bill in charge. I see it is introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES], who is not present this evening. My suggestion is to lay aside the bill informally without losing its place.

Mr. RICE. I know this lady lives in Brooklyn, which is represented by Mr. JAMES.

Mr. BRADY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally. Is there objection?

Mr. BRADY. I must object to that for the present.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. He says that this woman has been once already the beneficiary of Congress, and that the pension she now draws was given her by act of Congress. I wish to ask the gentleman whether every pension bill passed here to-night reported from his committee is not in the same category—whether in every case the pension is not granted by Congress because the Pension Bureau would not grant it.

Mr. MATSON. Oh, no doubt of that; but when these parties who have once been pensioned by act of Congress come again for an increase of pension I think we ought to let them stand aside and give some one else a turn.

Mr. WILLIS. This is supplementing what Congress has already done for this claimant.

Mr. MATSON. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. How much did the husband of this claimant draw per month for his services while living?

Mr. BRADY. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. PERKINS. Fourteen dollars or $15 per month?

Mr. BRADY. About that, I suppose.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, does the gentleman think that this woman should receive from the Government as a pension twice as much per month as her husband received in his lifetime for his services?

Mr. BRADY. I think that under the circumstances of the case and for the reasons stated the proposed pension ought to be granted. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, in a former Congress I investigated this case, and I think I know all the facts. The husband of this woman was not a soldier but a marine, and served his country as a marine for thirty and odd years in the most difficult and perilous service that is known. The report about him was that he was a man of excellent character, honest, perfectly temperate, with no bad habits whatever, and that he broke down in the service of his country. He became sick, and as a mark of honor was placed in a hospital.

Mr. WILLIS. Will my colleague permit me to ask him where this brave soldier served?

Mr. WOLFORD. I want to answer your remarks here, and I will not have time to answer your question in five minutes. If my time were extended, I would. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I say this man broke down in the service of his country and was placed in the hospital. His wife went and nursed him and ruined her own health while nursing him. Now I want to answer my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]. He says he can not go before his constituents and justify himself if he votes for this bill.

Sir, I can go to my constituents and say to them whenever you furnish a man that has served his country thirty-odd years on the boisterous ocean, in toil and peril, in war and in peace, I will vote him a pension of $30 a month. I will vote it for such a man in my own State, I will vote it for him in Brooklyn, I will vote it in any place where a man can be found to have rendered such service to his country. Is the whole life of a man nothing? Is he to serve his country for thirty and odd years in every kind of danger and break himself down and die of disease, and then are we to hear that there are thousands of other cases equally meritorious, and that therefore he must not have a pension?

If there are thousands of other such cases, then the proper thing to do is to give them all equal pension. Do not say that if you give a poor little pension to a man who has served his country for a whole lifetime you can not face your constituents. A man spends his life in his country's service and at last breaks down; his wife goes to him and nurses him and tries to keep him alive until her own health breaks down and she is helpless; and then are we to be told that such a woman shall not receive a proper pension because we can not face our constituents? I am astonished at my colleague! I would say to my constituents, "This man honored his country; let his country honor him. He served his country; let his country do right by him and his widow."

Mr. Chairman, we all know that there have been pensions allowed by this very Congress in cases where the services were not as meritorious as in this case, pensions of $30 a month; but I am about to move to reduce this pension to $20. Surely nobody can begrudge $20 a month to the widow of this gallant man. Surely nobody can begrudge $20 a month to her who stood by the man who gave his life to his country. He is dead and her health is ruined, and you tell me that man and wife both may ruin their health in the service of the country and yet that the poor little sum of $20 or $30 a month is to be denied them by a great nation like this that honors its soldiers.

Sir, if you do not give it to others, the proper thing to do is to come up and give it to them. Do not plead your own wrong. Do not stultify yourselves and the Congress of the United States by saying, "We have done wrong; we have denied justice in hundreds of other cases, and therefore we can not do right in this case." That is no argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has expired.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

MARY E. FILLEBROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1138) to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown, widow of the late Commodore Thomas Scott Fillebrown, from $30 to $50 per month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ESTATE OF MALITTY ROSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2585) for the relief of the estate of Malitty Rose.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the United States pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn., be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay to the administrator of the estate of Malitty Rose, deceased, the sum of $1,556.68, out of any money he may have placed to his credit for the payment of pensions; the said sum being due on account of reissue certificate No. 3259, issued to said Malitty Rose prior to her death, as widow of Elias Rose, a private in Captain McCoy's company, United States infantry.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to hear the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2585) for the relief of estate of Malitty Rose, submit the following report:

That it appears from the papers now on file in the Pension Office that Malitty Rose was the widow of Elias Rose, a private in Captain McCoy's company, United States infantry, engaged in the Florida war. Under act of Congress approved February 3, 1853 (section 4732 R. S.), the said Malitty Rose was granted a widow's five-year one-half-pay pension; said pension commenced December 3, 1853, and expired December 3, 1858.

On June 3, 1858, six months before the expiration of her five-year grant, an act (now section 4725 R. S.) was approved, continuing that class of pensions for life. After the expiration of the five-year grant the Pension Office dropped the name of Malitty Rose from the roll and did not continue her a pensioner for life, as provided by said act of June 3, 1858.

On March 29, 1879, she made application for restoration and accrued pension from date her name was dropped from the pension-roll. On June 9, 1879, she was restored to the roll, and paid a pension from date of completion of evidence in accordance with section 4713 Revised Statutes. This section provides that when an application has not been filed within three years of the termination of the pension previously granted, the pension under said application shall commence from date of completing the evidence. The claimant made several unsuccessful attempts, between the years 1879 and 1885, to get a reversal of above decision as to arrears; finally she took her case on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, who, on March 5, 1885, rendered a favorable decision, using the following language: "It is believed by the Department that the provisions of section 4713 should not be applied to this case, for the reason that the name of Mrs. Rose was on the roll when the act of June 3, 1858, was passed, and that the act could have been properly executed in her case without requiring of her an application. The act continued the pension she was receiving at the date of its passage, and the certificate for the continued pension might properly have been issued without any action on her part," and directed that a reissue certificate be issued for amount of accrued pension, namely, $1,556.68.

On March 17, 1885, the Pension Office notified her attorney that the reissue certificate had that day been issued and sent to the pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn.

On April 9, 1885, over three weeks after the issue of her certificate, and the pension agent had been directed to pay her the amount of accrued pension, the claimant died.

The administrator signed the vouchers and returned them to the agent, demanding payment. He was denied. He applied to the Commissioner of Pensions to direct the payment as asked, who, in a letter to the attorney, dated July 22, 1885, declined to do so, giving as a reason the law as expressed in section 4718 Revised Statutes. He then appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, asking payment upon the ground that the Government should not profit by its own wrong in first dropping the name of Malitty Rose from the rolls in direct opposition to the provisions of act of June 3, 1858, which declared the pension should continue for life; second, in refusing payment of accrued pension in June 9, 1879, and thereafter until March 5, 1885; third, in the long withholding of the vouchers (over three weeks) and negligence of duty by the pension agent; and fourth, that the decision of March 5, 1885, was rendered by a competent tribunal; hence the question was res adjudicata; the character of pension had ceased, and was thereafter one of the settlement of a judgment against the United States.

This appeal was decided adversely to the estate by the Secretary of the Interior, upon the ground "that no equity powers in the matter are vested" in his Department. The administrator of the estate of Malitty Rose now applies to Congress for relief.

From the facts before us we are satisfied that it was through no neglect on the part of the claimant in applying for or in proving her claim that she was kept from enjoying the use of the money that clearly belonged to her, but that it was through the erroneous acts of the agents of the Government, particularly of the pension agent in retaining the vouchers in his hands for so long a period as three weeks, more than sufficient time to have closed the matter up; that had it not been for this last act of negligence the vouchers and money would have reached the claimant before her death and the estate would have been benefited thereby.

The principles of equity apply to prevent the United States from reaping the benefit of the wrong acts of their agents and in favor of those who would have been benefited had it not been for said acts.

The theory advanced, that the decision of March 5, 1885, is a judgment and carries with it an obligation of debt, is sufficient within itself to warrant the granting of the relief asked for in the accompanying bill.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill without amendment, and recommend that it pass as reported.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the passage of this bill would establish a dangerous precedent. The proposition, as I understand, is to give to the estate of this woman something over $1,000 for the benefit either of her creditors or her heirs; for she herself is dead and beyond the reach of any pension. Now, I do not see any reason why the Government of the United States should pay this money in that way. It is not stated that this woman has left any minor children or other relatives who were dependent upon her. It may have been wrong to have kept her pension from her; the officers in the Pension Department may have decided wrongfully; but I see no equity in any claim of her creditors to this pension money. If she had obtained it during her lifetime it would not have been subject to the payment of debts; her creditors would not have obtained any benefit from it.

Mr. PETERS. If there were any heirs would not this money go to the heirs instead of the administrator; and the bill being drawn so as to give the money to the administrator, is not that evidence that there are no heirs?

Mr. MATSON. I presume so. Under the law pension money is not subject to the payment of debts. In my judgment this bill ought not to pass. I think it would establish a dangerous precedent, for there are many other claims of this kind. I think there are a dozen before our committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reported this bill from the Committee on Pensions, and I believe the relief proposed is just and legal; unquestionably it is equitable. If the representatives of the Government of the United States have any idea of being honest they will pass this bill. I have no interest whatever in this matter; I have no knowledge of the parties, except so far as I have learned of them through the evidence, which I believe to be trustworthy, and I will lay it before the House. I have, however, this much interest, that I think the Government of the United States ought to try to be honest, and ought to be willing to pay its just debts. I believe such a debt to exist in this case.

Malitty Rose was granted a five-year one-half-pay pension under act of Congress February, 1853. Before the expiration of this five-year grant Congress passed an act, now section 4725 Revised Statutes, which provided that her pension should continue to her for life in the following terms: And they (the widows) are hereby granted a continuance of such one-half-pay pension under the following terms and limitations, namely, to such widows during life. At the expiration of her five-year pension the Government ceased to pay her her pension, in direct opposition to the instructions and provisions contained in the above-quoted law.

In 1879 she made an application for restoration and the pension which had accrued between the date of her being dropped from the rolls, December 3, 1858, and the date of her application, March 29, 1879. The Government granted her a restoration and a widow's pension from June 9, 1879, that being the date of the completion of her evidence, and refused to pay her the accrued pension on the ground that she was barred from claiming the same under section 4713 Revised Statutes, which reads:

In all cases in which the cause of disability or death originated in the service prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, and an application for pension shall not have been filed within three years from the discharge or death of the person on whose account the claim is made, or within three years of the termination of the pension previously granted on account of the service and death of the same person, the pension shall commence from the date of filing, by the party prosecuting the claim, the last paper required to establish the same.

From this time until 1885 she made repeated attempts to secure the payment of this accrued pension, but was refused by the Commissioner. On March 1, 1885, she appealed to the Secretary of the Interior. The action of the Commissioner of Pensions was reversed, and she was declared to be entitled to the accrued pension as claimed. He held that under the terms of the act of June 3, 1858, now Revised Statutes 4725, she was improperly and wrongfully dropped from the rolls, and section 4713 Revised Statutes could not operate to bar her as claimed. He directed that a reissue certificate be issued, and she be paid the amount of accrued pension, namely, $1,556.68.

On March 1885, the Pension Office sent her reissue certificate to the pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn. On April 9, 1885, three weeks thereafter, she died. Three days after her death the pension agent sent to her address the vouchers, or receipts, for the payment of the above-named sum. Her administrator signed the same in his official capacity, and demanded payment. He was denied under the provisions of section 4718 Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

If any pensioner has died, or shall hereafter die, or if any person entitled to a pension, having an application therefor, pending has died, or shall hereafter die, his widow, or if there is no widow, a child, or children, of such person under sixteen years of age shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to the date of death of such person. Such accrued pension shall not be considered as a part of the assets of the estate of deceased, and if no widow or child survive no payment whatever of the accrued pension shall be made or allowed.

An appeal from the above decision to the Secretary of the Interior was taken, who sustained the position taken in the following language:

The provisions of section 4718 Revised Statutes govern in every case in which the direct beneficiary under a pension certificate has deceased. Alleged wrong and neglect upon the part of the Pension Office or pension agencies do not give rise to title not otherwise conferred by law. The Government is not responsible for the torts or laches of the pension agent.

The facts that I have narrated do not sustain the ground taken by the Government. I call attention to the fact that the Government first erred in dropping the name of Malitty Rose from the rolls and denying her the money which she was entitled to as the widow of a soldier for over twenty-five years, as is acknowledged by the Secretary of the Interior in his opinion of March 5, 1885.

Again, the Government, through its agents, was guilty of neglect and wrong in delaying the payment for over three weeks after the issue of the certificate. I take the ground that after a certificate had been issued for the payment as above stated, section 4718 Revised Statutes could not bar its payment, inasmuch as that section does not contemplate any wrong or delay. The law as defined in this section manifestly contemplates applications for pension where no rights have previously accrued. This case differs from such cases in that her right to a pension never ceased after the date of the act which made her a pensioner for life. I also take the further ground that after the issuing of the certificate the nature of the obligation became twofold—not only was it accrued pension that was due Malitty Rose, but it was a debt due her from the Government.

The money due her differs from the pension that may accrue to a claimant through the dropping of his name from the rolls because of certain information which the Pension Office may have become possessed of that would seem to debar the pensioner from a pension, and which the law provides he may be paid when he shall prove the falsity of such information. It differs in that the money that was due her arose from the willful dropping of her name from the pension-roll in the face of an act which provided she should be kept thereon during life. The fact that this money was wrongfully withheld from her imparts a sacredness to the obligation thereby incurred. Not only is the money due her as a pensioner, but as a pensioner who has been wrongfully kept from the same. After the certificate was issued it became a matter of absolute debt on the part of the Government, and was due as a matter of settlement of a judgment rendered by a competent tribunal.

I refer to the opinion of Attorney-General Nelson, dated August 28, 1843, in which, while discussing the case of Commodore Porter, his widow claiming the balance of pension due him under a decision of Secretary Paulding during the life of the commodore, which granted him certain pension, he uses the following language:

The decision of Secretary Paulding, upon the application of Commodore Porter, was in the nature of a judgment rendered by a tribunal of competent jurisdiction, which settled the rights of the claimant and put him upon the footing of an acknowledged creditor, to an ascertained amount, of the Government. As such creditor he might at any time during his life have demanded payment, which would not and could not rightfully have been refused him.

The fact of his forbearance of that demand does not, I think, extinguish his debt; but it remains due, and can be discharged only by payment to his legal representatives. * * * In the view I have taken of this case, the sum due is in the precise predicament of any other money to which the commodore at the period of his death was entitled. It is so much money in the hands of the Government to his credit, which belongs since his death to his executor if he has left a will, or to his administrator if he has died intestate.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The position of my colleague is that this case comes under that rule?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It comes precisely under that rule. If the law as there laid down is worth anything, this claim ought to be paid.

Mr. PETERS. Is there not this difference: At the time of the rendering of the decision which the gentleman has just read was not the widow of that commodore living?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether she was or not.

Mr. PETERS. I think so from the language of the opinion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. She may have been living. But I call attention to the language of this decision.

It is so much money in the hands of the Government to his credit, which belongs since his death to his executor if he has left a will, or to his administrator if he has died intestate.

Mr. PETERS. Unquestionably, if this woman were living she would be entitled to this money; but she being dead and having left no heirs (as I think is manifest from the reading of the bill, which provides for the payment of this money to the administrator), I do not believe it ever has been the policy of the Government to devote money which should have been appropriated to pensions to the payment of the debts of the party after death.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. As I understand this case, this is not for the payment of debts. I understand the money will go to minor heirs.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Are there minor heirs?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do not know that of my own knowledge, but I so understand the case. And without a measure of this kind the heirs can not come in and claim this money.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. If it could be established that there are minor heirs, minor children——

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I have no certain knowledge upon that point.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. If that could be established, it would change the entire posture of this case.

Mr. MORRILL. There can not be any minor children. This was an old lady.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] be content to have the word "estate" struck out and the word "heirs" inserted? I do not think it ought to be limited to minor heirs.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I would like to make a statement.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill and report it is a very different proposition from what most of us contemplated as they were first read from the desk. This pension was allowed before the death of the person pensioned. It is not a representative coming in now to prosecute to completion a pension claim, as she had prosecuted her pension claim to completion before she died. It had been allowed and determined in her favor before her death, and before her death the certificate had issued, with vouchers to pay to her the amount which the Department had found due to her. The pension agent at Knoxville had been directed to pay her that amount which the Department had found in her favor, but before she was advised of that fact, and before the vouchers could be returned, she died. Now this bill authorizes the representative of her estate to receive that from the Government which the Government had already allowed and found in her favor.

I do not think that it is a pension bill. I think if the Speaker of the House had understood the proposition when it was proposed to be referred to the Committee on Pensions it would never have been referred to that committee, but under the rules of the House as we now have it here, and as the bill and report came from the Pension Committee, I think, the committee having found the facts and reported its conclusion, we may authorize, notwithstanding the committee in the first place, in my judgment, never had properly jurisdiction of the matter, but, on the contrary, that it should have gone to a different committee. But this committee, Mr. Chairman, having considered it, and under the rules of the House we being authorized to consider bills coming from this committee, I think we can dispose of it equitably under the circumstances. The facts are as I have suggested, and, that being the case, it seems to me the representative of this estate is entitled to this money.

Mr. MORRILL. Not entitled to it under the general law.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not the law in a case of this kind that where money is not actually received by the pensioner it is returned to the Treasury? Is not that the general law?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes; that is the general law.

Mr. PERKINS. Where the certificate or draft has gone from the Commissioner of Pensions or the auditing officer to the claimant, but before it is placed in the hands of the claimant the claimant dies, I understand under such circumstances it will be returned.

Mr. MORRILL. But the draft had not been issued in this case.

Mr. PERKINS. But the certificate and vouchers had.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is an additional difference in this case from a case arising under the general law. In the first place, this woman was rightfully on the pension-roll by a law passed many years ago, giving her a pension of five years' duration, but before the expiration of that five years, by no fault of hers and solely through the fault of the Government, she was dropped from the rolls. So she could never have been required to make any application. The requirement arose from the wrongful act of the Government agent. Had she not suffered from that wrongful act this woman would have been paid year by year had she lived.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I also refer to the opinion given by Attorney-General Caleb Cushing, dated June 9, 1856, in the case of Jesse Lovering, recorded (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 7, page 717, edition 1856), in which he refers to the opinion of Attorney-General Nelson in the following language:

Nor is it the question of a pension or arrears of pension adjudicated to a party but remaining unpaid in the hands of the Government. That case seems to be settled upon sound principles. (Mr. Nelson's opinion of August 28, 1843, Opinions, edition 1851, page 1627.)

In this case not only was the decision of the Secretary of the Interior rendered granting her the money, but the certificate for the payment of the same had been issued, and the pension agent ordered to pay the money thereon. If the ground taken by the Attorney-General above named is correct, and it undoubtedly is, then the money appropriated by bill 2585 is due the estate of Malitty Rose, and no quibble should be made over the passage of said bill.

The position taken by the Secretary of the Interior in denying payment of accrued pensions on the ground that section 4718 Revised Statutes prohibited the same, and that "the Government is not responsible for the torts or laches of the pension agent," is a remarkable one indeed. I had always supposed that the principal is responsible for the act of his agent.

Granting, for the sake of argument, that the estate has no legal claim against the Government because of the issuing of the pension certificates, there can be no dispute as to their equitable rights; a stronger equity case could not well be imagined. Such being the fact, it is wholly within the province of Congress to pass such an act as will secure to them their right. And this the bill 2585 provides for. Let it be passed, and the skirts of the Government cleared of an undoubted wrong which has been sustained for over a quarter of a century.

Now, Mr. Chairman, by that act of 1858 no one disputes this woman should have received and enjoyed her pension during the quarter of a century she was illegally kept out of it, as decided by competent authority. They placed her on the rolls in 1879. She does not make any application for a pension; she is entitled to it now. She says: "Give me what you owe me according to the law and the decision." This, then, would go to her representatives under the law. And I apprehend that in this case the equities are so strong that the House will pass the bill and say that this estate, no matter to whom it goes, whether to the administrator or the legal representatives, let it be minor or not, should be paid this amount of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 19, noes 10.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET B. HARWOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret B. Harwood, widow of Rear-Admiral Andrew A. Harwood, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. PRICE. I do not call for the reading of the report in this case, but I can not let that go by without asking a vote of the committee upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MORRILL. Let us go on a few minutes longer and get over a few more cases.

The motion that the committee rise was not agreed to.

MRS. LAURA HENTIG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2464) to increase the pension of Mrs. Laura Hentig.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Laura Hentig, widow of Edmund C. Hentig, late a captain in the Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of that now allowed her.

The report (by Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR) is as follows:

This case presents some strong reasons for an increase of pension, and we recommend that the bill do pass, after having been amended by striking out "fifty," in the seventh line, and inserting in place thereof "thirty."

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 15, noes 15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill seems to have been reported by Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, who is not here. He says in the report that there are strong reasons for the increase of the pension, but these reasons do not seem to be embodied in the report. I ask, therefore, that the bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRADY. The other bills from the Committee on Pensions on the Calendar immediately following this are also reported by Mr. TAYLOR, who is absent; I move, therefore, that the committee rise.

Mr. HALE. I represent the next bill on the Calendar, and I hope that motion will not be insisted upon.

Mr. BRADY. I withdraw the motion.

WILLIAM J. OWINGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4097) for the relief of William J. Owings.

The bill is as follows:

Whereas, in conformity with an act of Congress approved March 9, 1878, certificate numbered 25639, for original-service pension, dated March 6, 1883, was issued to Henry Owings, a private in Capt. James Dudley's company of Kentucky militia in the war of 1812; and

Whereas said Henry Owings died December 28, 1881, before said certificate was issued, leaving no estate whatever, and no widow or child under sixteen years of age; and

Whereas William J. Owings, of Randolph County, Missouri, a son of said Henry Owings, had the entire care and support of his father, the said Henry Owings, for ten years immediately preceding his death, he being then very old and enfeebled by age, having died on the date aforesaid in his eighty-fourth year; and

Whereas under existing laws no money can be drawn on said pension certificate except an amount sufficient to pay the expenses of the last sickness and burial of said deceased pensioner, a sum wholly inadequate to reimburse said William J. Owings for his support of the deceased pensioner in his old age; Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Pensions is directed to pay to William J. Owings, of Randolph County, Missouri, the amount of pension which had accrued to Henry Owings, deceased, at the time of his death, December 28, 1881, by virtue of certificate numbered 25639, for original-service pension, dated March 6, 1883.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report in the case.

The report (by Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR) is as follows:

It appearing from the papers on file with the committee, in the shape of affidavits and documents from the Pension Office, that the recitations in the preamble of House bill 4097 are true, your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise. This matter is certainly going to excite a great deal of controversy. By the time we pass the bills through the House already recommended by the committee it will be quite late.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 14, noes 15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I can add but little to the facts embodied in the bill and the report. The report itself states the fact that the recitations in the preamble of the bill are correct. The papers are on file in the Pension Office.

I have personal knowledge of some of the facts in the case, not a great deal. I knew this old soldier at the time of his death and for years prior to it. He was one of the oldest men in Randolph County, perhaps in the State of Missouri, when he died. He left no estate. This son had taken care of him for years before his death. The bill is to pay the amount of the accrued pension to the date of his death to the son. As I understand the law, only an amount sufficient to pay the last sickness could be drawn by the administrator. In this case it would be very hard to say when the last sickness began. He was very old and very feeble—bedridden years before he died. This son, one of a large family, was the only one who took care of him, spent money on him, and cared for him in his last sickness, and buried him. It is comparatively a small sum of money, I do not know exactly the amount, but a very small sum, a few hundred dollars. It is only just and equitable that the bill should pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the bald proposition submitted to us by this bill is to pension a man who never served the United States a single day. That is all there is of it. We are asked to pension a man who was not dependent upon anybody at all and to pay him a pension, or a large sum of money as a pension, while it does not show that he served the country in a military capacity a single hour. I say it is not right. There are many such cases. One case is now pending before the Pensions Committee where the party has been urging the committee to allow a payment of $6,000 which has accrued. The father was helpless and was pensioned at $72 per month. This is an effort to pension a man who never served the Government a day. If we are to vote great sums of money in the shape of pensions to men who never served the Government a single day it will break up the pension business and discredit it more than anything else. It will not do. It is not right.

Mr. PRICE. There are two other considerations, it strikes me, that ought to have some force: First, in the passage of this bill we are determining who are the legal representatives of this deceased soldier. For my own part I have not sufficient evidence to determine that question. Then we are voting an indefinite amount. The gentleman who introduced this bill says it will only be a few hundred dollars. But it may amount to several thousand dollars. There should be some limit to the amount. And as I have said, there should be better evidence than this House has that this man is the legal representative of the soldier, who may have had some claim against the Government. And thirdly, I say the whole principle of this bill is wrong, and it should not pass this House.

Mr. ROGERS. I had no idea of taking any part in the discussion on a pension question this evening. But I am not willing to let this bill pass without making some suggestions in regard to it.

In the first place it is clear to me this bill never had any business before the Committee on Pensions. If the point of order had been made it would certainly have gone to the Committee on Claims. I do not suppose that when the House authorized these evening sessions they ever dreamed that any business would be transacted except the passage of pension claims.

There is a general law on this subject. Within my brief experience here two cases have fallen under my observation of the very class to which this one belongs. One was that of the widow of a soldier of the war of 1812. Her certificate was issued and reached her home two days before her death, but she was in that state that she was unable to make any assignment to any person to collect it. The result was I was appealed to to take the certificate and obtain the amount. The only method under the law was to apply to the Treasury Department and show that the representative of the pensioner was entitled to it by reason of expenses incurred in the pensioner's last sickness and for her burial charges. That is permitted by the general law.

Another case recently occurred where an army surgeon died. He had only one son. The widow survived but a short time. A certificate was issued under similar circumstances, and within the last ten days the certificate was sent to me and I was compelled to to return it, because the pensioner had left ample means to bear the funeral charges and the expenses of his last sickness.

We ought not to depart from the principle established by precedent and practice. In my judgment, if the attention of the House of Representatives was called to the fact that eight or ten or twenty members under the order of the House met here to pass pension bills on Friday evenings, and instead of that passed claims bills of this kind, the order certainly would be modified. If at these evening sessions private claims outside of pension bills can be brought here and be disposed of by a dozen members by common consent, I say that is not a safe thing to indulge in.

For one I am unwilling this measure should be disposed of in this way. It went to the Committee on Pensions improperly. It is before this committee to-night improperly. I admit that since it has come here reported from the Pensions Committee the Chair would now overrule any point of order. But if the point had been made at the proper time, then the matter would not have gone to the Committee on Pensions, and it should not have come here to-night.

I invite the attention of the Chair to this provision of the rule:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committee named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating to the pensions of all the wars of the United States, other than the civil war, to the Committee on Pensions.

"Subjects relating to all the wars of the United States other than the civil war." This does not relate to the wars of the United States. This does not relate to any pension matter; it has to do with appropriating a sum of money out of the Treasury to compensate a son who took care of his father in his last days of illness; it is not a pension; it is not in the nature of a pension; it has no relation to a pension. I do not think the House should take jurisdiction of a matter of this kind. It is a clear and distinct violation of the rules of the House and of the jurisdiction conferred on the House at these Friday evening sittings by special order, and I am not willing that this bill should pass until it is acted upon by this body in a full House, when it can have proper consideration. I therefore move that the committee rise. It is useless to occupy more time on this bill to-night.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Arkansas. Could we not make an arrangement by which this bill should go into the House to be acted upon when a quorum is present?

Mr. ROGERS. I am willing to agree to that. And at the proper time I will move to refer these bills to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Including the one which has already been laid aside to be reported to the House?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRADY. I make the point of order that this committee has no right to take action of any other than pension matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the special order to be read, under which the House meets on Friday evenings.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill that is under consideration by the Committee of the Whole is unquestionably reported from the Committee on Pensions, and it is a private bill; and there is no question about the jurisdiction of this committee or of the House over this bill to-night under the special order. There is doubt in the mind of the Chair as to whether under this special order the committee can go outside of the order to refer this bill or any other bill to any other committee.

Mr. ROGERS. Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that I did not make the point of order. I am entirely with the Chair upon that proposition. What I said was that the bill was improperly referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that the bill was improperly before this committee.

Mr. ROGERS. Now? Not at all, sir. It is properly before this committee, but it was improperly referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has always construed this rule rigidly, and has repeatedly refused to entertain even a motion for unanimous consent that a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions might come here on Friday night and report a bill so as to place it upon the Calendar; simply because the rule says that only reports from the two committees named, private bills on the Calendar, shall be considered at these Friday evening sessions.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order, because I understood the gentleman from Arkansas to say that he moved to refer these two bills to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROGERS. I said that if it was in order I would do so at the proper time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, why can not a motion be entertained at this time to report this bill to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Claims?

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman in charge of this bill will consent, I will move that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] moves that the bill under consideration be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I always regret when I am compelled to differ with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] after he has oracularly spoken with regard to any matter of parliamentary law. I do it with great diffidence, but I submit, sir, that this bill has been referred by the House to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that the statement of the gentleman or anybody else that it has been improperly referred is entirely gratuitous. There is no evidence of that at all.

The House of Representatives has the power to refer its business to any committee it chooses, and there is nothing before this committee to satisfy me that this bill was not referred by unanimous consent to the Committee on Pensions, that it was not properly so referred, that it was not properly reported to this House, or that it is not now properly before this Committee of the Whole. The simple fact that it might have been referred in the ordinary way to another committee is not to my mind satisfactory proof that the course I have spoken of was not in fact taken by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will interrupt the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] for a moment, to have read for the information of members the official record upon the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

January 18, 1886.—Read twice, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed. February 3, 1886.—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, March 2, 1886.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will see by this record that this bill has been twice acted on by the Speaker of the House. It was first referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; that committee was discharged from its consideration, and under the order of the Speaker the bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and by that committee it was reported to the House and was placed upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, it often occurs in the House that a bill is introduced and the Speaker decides that it should go to a certain committee, but by the action of the House it is sent to another committee. In other words, the House by its action can send a bill to any committee that it sees fit.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this proposed reference will not be made, for it would be equivalent to killing the bill. I am a member of the committee to which it is proposed to refer this bill. We have already had referred to that committee during this session about eighteen hundred bills. Over one thousand remain unacted upon, simply because with the most arduous attention to the duties of that committee the members have been unable to act upon them. To refer this bill to the Committee on Claims is, therefore, its certain death. May not an arrangement be made that it be left on the Private Calendar for action on Friday—not Friday evening?

Mr. BRADY. I move that the committee now rise. It is evident that we are wasting time in this discussion.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion long enough to enable me to make a proposition which I hope will meet the approbation of the House.

Mr. BRADY. We are wasting a great deal of time in the discussion of questions of parliamentary law; and from present indications this discussion may go on for two or three hours.

Mr. PRICE. No time will be wasted by the motion which I propose to make. I desire to submit a proposition that these four bills to which exceptions are taken be sent back to the House to be acted on when a quorum is present. At that time let the House do what it pleases.

Mr. BRADY. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that as to the bills which have been already laid aside to be reported to the House, the gentleman's proposition would have to be made after the rising of the committee.

Mr. PRICE. I know that this arrangement can only be made by general consent——

Mr. BRADY. After the committee rises.

Mr. PRICE. But we can consent now that when the committee rises we shall adopt that course.

Mr. BRADY. That is a matter for after consideration. I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

SANFORD GOIN.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5870) granting a pension to Sanford Goin; and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported without amendment from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2254) for the relief of Jane M. Langley;
A bill (H. R. 4589) granting a pension to Frederick Bauman;
A bill (H. R. 2011) granting a pension to Joseph Chalfant;
A bill (H. R. 553) granting a pension to William J. Suffall;
A bill (H. R. 4539) granting a pension to Ann Little;
A bill (H. R. 5284) granting a pension to Rinaldo R. Somes;
A bill (H. R. 5394) granting a pension to Sally Ann Bradley;
A bill (H. R. 1782) granting a pension to Cornelia W. Ellis;
A bill (H. R. 1821) granting a pension to Daniel Kain;
A bill (H. R. 944) for the relief of Mary Jane Conrad;
A bill (H. R. 5100) granting a pension to Eleanor Foust;
A bill (H. R. 6389) granting a pension to Francis M. Moore;
A bill (H. R. 5678) for the relief of Mrs. Martha A. Marble;
A bill (H. R. 1651) for the relief of Rosina Heineman;
A bill (H. R. 1593) for the relief of Sarah Manz;
A bill (H. R. 1652) for the relief of Frances Hasenzahl;

A bill (H. R. 5038) for the relief of Stephen Sauer;
A bill (H. R. 1548) for the relief of Ellen Crymble;
A bill (H. R. 5331) granting a pension to Emma M. Shiner;
A bill (H. R. 3836) granting a pension to James Dunbar;
A bill (H. R. 5702) granting a pension to Jenet L. Johnson;
A bill (H. R. 4517) granting a pension to Timothy Driscoll;
A bill (H. R. 1990) granting a pension to John Hunter;
A bill (H. R. 3148) granting a pension to James W. Colville; and
A bill (H. R. 4723) granting a pension to Joseph E. Van Horn.

Mr. PRICE (when the bill (H. R. 1138) to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown was reached) said: I desire that this bill be laid aside till we get through the passage of bills to which there is no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be done if there be no objection.

Mr. MATSON (when the bill (H. R. 2585) for the relief of the estate of Malitty Rose was reached) said: At the proper time I desire to move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside informally for the present.

Mr. PRICE (when the bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood was reached) said: I desire that this bill be laid aside to be considered after the disposition of bills to which there is no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside informally for the present.

Amendments to the following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 473) granting a pension to William Boone;
A bill (H. R. 4960) granting a pension to Mary S. Webster;
A bill (H. R. 1816) granting a pension to Mary Ann Miller;
A bill (H. R. 4219) granting a pension to Daniel Jacks;
A bill (H. R. 4111) granting a pension to Minerva T. Thompson;
A bill (H. R. 4615) for the relief of Ann Leddy;
A bill (H. R. 4400) granting a pension to Polly Belden;
A bill (H. R. 2193) granting a pension to Amelia M. Green;
A bill (H. R. 429) granting a pension to Harry McElhinny; and
A bill (H. R. 403) granting a pension to Rachel W. Heard.

EMILY LOUISA SPICER.

Mr. PRICE. Let the bill (H. R. 5506) granting a pension to Emily Louisa Spicer be set aside from those reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that will accordingly be done.

SAMUEL FROST.

Mr. NEECE. What has become of the Samuel Frost bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment to the title and it will now be acted upon.

The amendments to the bill (H. R. 4374) granting a pension to Samuel Frost were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Samuel Frost."

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes by which bills had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ESTATE OF MALITTY ROSE.

Mr. MATSON. I now move, Mr. Speaker, that the bill (H. R. 2585) for the relief of the estate of Malitty Rose be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that under the special order of the House that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the session is held this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening session private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. HATCH. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of a bill on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions or from the Committee on Invalid Pensions does not carry with it the power under that special order to remove the bill from this Calendar and send it to another committee of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being regarded as oracular I beg to differ with my friend from Missouri. Now, what does consider mean? If we can take up a bill and dispose of it finally, either by passing it or rejecting it, it seems to me we can make any other disposition of it which may to us seem best. We can lay it on the table or send it to any other committee. The order covers bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and from the Committee on Pensions (this is one of them; I do not know from which committee it has come), and also bills reported from the Judiciary Committee removing political disabilities. It occurs to me if we can dispose of a bill finally and forever we may make any other disposition of it. To consider involves any action on the part of the House.

Mr. MATSON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a court which has jurisdiction and the right to make final disposition of a matter has the right to make any interlocutory order during the proceedings. This motion to refer to the Committee on Claims is in the nature of an interlocutory order, and I think there can be no question about the power of the House to take that action.

Mr. PETERS. If the point of order of the gentleman from Missouri is correct, then this House can enter into no arrangement by which a bill may go to the Calendar to be considered as unfinished business when the House next assembles to consider this class of business.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire what bill is under consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill (H. R. 2585) for the relief of the estate of Malitty Rose.

The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I should like to be heard for a moment before final action is taken upon that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has had read the order under which the House assembles to-night, and begs leave to state that the limitation therein is as to the character of business that shall be entered upon, and is not a limitation as to what the House shall do with that business when under consideration. The Chair is of opinion that this is the turning point in the question.

Now, the Chair thinks it will not be insisted that as to the bills reported from the Committee on Pensions, Invalid Pensions, and those reported from the Committee on the Judiciary removing political disabilities, there is any limitation that applies, by the order under which the House now assembles, which would exist if these bills were being considered at any other time than on Friday evening, and the question is whether the House in limiting the class of business to be considered has limited the method in which it shall be considered, or limited the House in the course it shall take with reference to it.

The Chair is of opinion that no such limitation is intended; and that the House to-night, while it could not enter upon any other than the three classes of reports mentioned in the order, has as plenary power over those three classes of business as it would have at any other time, and therefore overrules the point of order, and thinks the House may commit the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. In regard to this bill I will just state that I do not think it was improperly committed in the first instance to the Committee on Pensions. I believe that it was undoubtedly within the power of the Speaker of the House to refer the bill to the Committee on Pensions under the rule, as it is unquestionably a pension matter, and I believe it was properly before that committee and was properly reported by them, and without objection passed the Committee of the Whole and is now on its final passage before the House.

Now there is no doubt of the power of the House in recommitting to the same committee; but to change the disposition of the bill, or to take away all right of the committee to the consideration of the bill when on its final passage after it has been referred, and undoubtedly by a power which the House had, even if it was admitted that it had been improperly referred to it, I think there is great doubt. For if this does not apply to the Pension Committee it is hard to tell what committee it applies to. It is entirely a pension matter, clear and plain. This House made no objection to the reference or to action being taken on it at that time.

I have no objection to any action on the bill that will put it before the whole House. I am willing to risk its merits before the whole House when every member is in his seat, for if they have any respect for the law or common honesty it will undoubtedly pass.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to offer a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the bill be laid aside to retain its place on the Calendar, to be considered in full House when it may be reached on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I ask unanimous consent that that order be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PRICE. To facilitate matters and obtain action as rapidly as possible, I move that the three bills of the House, numbered 1138, to increase the pension of Mary E. Fillebrown; 81, granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood; and 5506, granting a pension to Emily Louisa Spicer, take the same order as this, and go over as unfinished business, to be considered by a full House at any time that they may be reached. I ask consent that they retain their places on the Calendar, and take this course, and the sooner action is taken upon them by a quorum in the House the better.

Mr. MATSON. I have one suggestion to make. I think the House will be a little impatient to have the bills thrust upon them at any other time than Friday, when private bills are called up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that they would go over until Friday.

Mr. MATSON. The Speaker of the House ruled on last Monday that when the previous question had been ordered upon the passage of a bill it came up for consideration and final action on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be the case if the bill had been engrossed and read the third time, and the previous question had been ordered upon its passage. In this case the previous question is not ordered.

Mr. MATSON. I do not want the bills to be unduly thrust upon the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Are not these bills on their passage now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not on their final passage now. They were laid aside, objection being made to them at the time, by consent; and they were not included in the list of those ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. ELY. I desire to make this inquiry: Whether if these bills are passed over by unanimous consent until next Friday, when we will have a quorum of the House present, they will then take precedence of other private bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a point the Chair would hardly like to decide at this time. It would depend on what action is taken hereafter to-night on them and on the state of other business when the subject is resumed.

Mr. BRADY. In the case of the bill increasing the pension of Mrs. Mitchell, considered in the Committee of the Whole two Fridays ago, the action contemplated was taken, but it was overruled by the Speaker and the House. That bill came up on Monday last as unfinished business.

Mr. WINANS. The previous question having been ordered on it.

The SPEAKER. Where the previous question is ordered on a bill it comes up the first thing the next day after reading the Journal. The previous question has not been ordered on these bills, and that is the reason why the Chair did not like to forestall the action that might be taken by the House when they should come up. Is there objection to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 13, 1886.

FUNERAL SERVICES OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

The Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, help us to come into Thy presence with thanksgiving, and into Thy courts with praise; for that Thou art good Thy wondrous works declare; and Thy goodness extendeth even unto us, for as individuals Thou hast greatly blessed us, and as a nation Thou hast set us as a city upon a hill whose light can not be hid.

Grant, we pray Thee, that the light which is within us may never become darkness, but may it be so replenished that across the darkest night our institutions may flash signals of encouragement and cheer to the weary, heavy-laden peoples of the earth.

Again Thy servant Death has come among us and brought a glad release to a weary, patient sufferer. We thank Thee that our brother was enabled through grace to triumph in the presence of forces which dissolved this earthly tabernacle and hastened his moving into the building of God, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Help us to live like him, that like him we also may know, when our heart and our flesh faileth, what it is to have Thee as the strength of our heart and our portion forever.

We beg the sweet ministries of grace for the afflicted family. Accompany them on their sad, long, lonely journey to their distant home; and in Thine own good time may they be permitted to rejoice again in the companionship of him who has preceded them into the region of the blessed, the land of the hereafter.

We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Redeemer. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By order of the Senate the usual business will be suspended this day to enable the Senate to participate in the funeral ceremonies deemed appropriate on the death of JOHN F. MILLER, late an honored member of this body from the State of California.

At five minutes past 12 o'clock the members of the House of Representatives, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and Clerk, and headed by the Speaker and Chaplain, entered the Senate Chamber. The Speaker was escorted to a seat at the right of the President pro tempore of the Senate; the Clerk and Chaplain at the Secretary's desk; and the members of the House were escorted to the seats on the floor provided for them.

They were soon followed by the Chief-Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the diplomatic corps, and the President and his Cabinet Ministers, who were respectively escorted to the seats assigned them on the floor of the Senate Chamber.

At half past 12 o'clock the casket containing the remains of the deceased Senator was brought into the Senate Chamber, preceded by Rev. WILLIAM A. LEONARD, D. D., rector of Saint John's church, of Washington city, and escorted by the committees of arrangements of the two Houses and pall-bearers selected from the Loyal Legion, and followed by members of the family and friends of the deceased.

The burial service of the Episcopal Church, with appropriate collects from the offices of the church, was read by Rev. Dr. LEONARD.

The benediction was pronounced by Rev. Dr. HUNTLEY, Chaplain of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The funeral ceremonies deemed appropriate to this occasion in the Senate Chamber are now terminated. We consign all that is mortal of our brother to the custody of an officer of the Senate and a committee of its members, to be conveyed to his home on the Pacific, and there committed for burial to those who have honored him and loved him so much when living. The Senate as a body will now attend the remains to the station.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate adjourn with a view to attend the funeral to the station.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 13, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., as follows:

Almighty and Eternal God, from whom we come, to whom we go, our days upon the earth are as a hand-breadth, and yet Thou biddest us in this theater of time to bear ourselves as sons of the Highest and heirs of immortality. Help us, we beseech Thee, by temperance, chastity, patience, gentleness, long-suffering, love of truth, honor, to purge ourselves from the stains of this earthly mold, to walk in humility and reverence before Thee; so that when our end on earth shall come there shall be none of the skulking of cowardice nor the fear of death; but may we calmly as Thy children enter Thy presence, and at Thy right hand with open vision behold the realities of character, of Thy nature, and that which Thou hast prepared for us, men on earth, men in heaven, sons of God. We ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

The SPEAKER. In compliance with the order made yesterday the House will now repair in a body to the Senate Chamber to attend the funeral services of the late Senator MILLER, of California.

The House, headed by the Speaker, accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) proceeded to the Senate Chamber.

The House reassembled at 12 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.

Mr. MCKENNA. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would not be improper for this House to adjourn again in respect to the memory of the late Senator MILLER. Therefore I make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BEACH: Petition of Robert Potts, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: Memorial of William H. Gill, praying for authority to prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims to recover the proceeds of cotton which was the property of the memorialist—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CANDLER: Petition of W. T. Nesbitt and 70 others, citizens of Norcross; and of Hon. R. D. Winn, Hon. J. D. Spence, and 205 others, citizens of Gwinnett County, Georgia, for national aid to common schools—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. EVERHART: Petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, requesting legislation for the purpose of applying surplus money to internal improvement, &c.—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. JOSEPH: Papers in the claim of William Ivers, of Santa Fé, N. Mex.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LANDES: Petition of C. W. Sanger and 43 others, citizens of Xenia, Clay County, Illinois, praying for free coinage of silver—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. LONG: Memorial of Knights of Labor, Local Assembly No. 3979, of Campello, Mass., in behalf of the Hennepin Canal—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. MILLS: Petition of citizens of Bell County, Texas, praying for deep water at Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. NEAL: Petition of F. A. Carden and Nancy C. Carden, widow of D. D. Carden, deceased, for pay and bounty for service in the Fourth Cavalry, Tennessee Volunteers, by the said F. A. Carden and D. D. Carden—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of J. M. Morrison, of Warren County, Tennessee, asking that the Postmaster-General be required to obey the act of March 3, 1883, in regard to the salaries of certain postmasters—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ROMEIS: Petition of A. Kisman and 70 others, citizens of Vermillion, Ohio, asking for an appropriation to improve harbor—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. SCRANTON: Petition of members of Wyoming County (Pennsylvania) bar, for passage of House bill 2124, concerning judicial districts of Pennsylvania—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHARLES STEWART: Petition of certain citizens of Fort Worth, Tex., requesting that Fort Worth be made a port of entry—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. THROCKMORTON: Petition of citizens of Sherman, Tex., asking for a sufficient appropriation to insure deep water at Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of citizens of Wichita County, Texas, for the same—to the same committee.

By Mr. TUCKER: Petition of Mrs. Fannie J. Weekes, of Virginia, for relief—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made a legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. DOCKERY: Of 110 citizens of Daviess County, Missouri.

The following petitions, praying Congress for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. CANDLER: Of Hon. J. D. Spence, Hon. R. D. Winn, and 205 others, citizens of Gwinnett County, Georgia; of W. T. Nesbit, Hon. J. P. Simmons, and 70 others, citizens of Norcross, Ga.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1886.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journals of the proceedings of Friday and Saturday last were read and approved.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg to offer a privileged resolution at this time, if there be no objection, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Rev. John G. Butler, of the city of Washington, be, and he hereby is, appointed Chaplain to the Senate in the place of Rev. E. D. Huntley, who has resigned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution, if there be no objection.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the question is put on agreeing to the resolution, I wish to state, although I know it is not common to say anything, that I am sure all of us may express in this informal way, as it is not customary to do it formally, our good wishes to our retiring Chaplain, whose intercourse with us personally has been so agreeable, and our hope that his future may be as pleasant as his past has been.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3039) to refund to Denton & Sage, of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $1,549.67, duties paid on sixty hogsheads of sugar, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

STEAMSHIP OZAMA.

The bill (H. R. 5219) to provide an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce has reported a bill for the relief of that vessel in terms exactly like this, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that this bill instead of being referred to the Committee on Commerce may take the place of the Senate bill already on the Calendar, and that the Senate bill may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are the bills of the same character?

Mr. FRYE. They are exactly word for word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that House bill 5219 may take the place on the Calendar of the Senate bill reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce. If there be no objection that order will be made. The title of the corresponding Senate bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1403) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection this bill will be postponed indefinitely. It is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Ingersoll, Mich., and a petition of Knights of Labor of Bay County, Michigan, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hannepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a memorial of Knights of Labor, Local Assembly No. 4707, of Winona, Minn., praying for liberal appropriations from the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and especially for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Minneapolis monthly meeting of Friends, Minnesota, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., would represent to your honorable body that the necessities of deepening the channel and improving the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River are manifestly constantly increasing.

The continued tide of immigration and consequent settlement and development of the State of Oregon, the Territories of Washington, Montana, and Idaho, is producing a vast trade which passes to and from the ocean by the Columbia River.

The growing commercial importance of the portion of country forming the Columbia River Basin is shown by the following figures:

In 1880, 63 vessels with cargoes, foreign, aggregating in value $4,181,352 crossed the Columbia River bar.

In 1885 (a year of general commercial depression), the clearances, foreign, over the bar were 118 vessels aggregating 120,000 tons with cargoes valued at $8,530,429, independent of the San Francisco and coastwise shipments, which aggregated in value $5,000,000 more.

The volume of trade is also swelled by the extension of the Northern Pacific and Oregon Short-line Railways.

Owing to the imperfection of the channel, the tax per ton is nearly $1.25.

The Engineer Corps began last year the work of building a jetty to improve the channel, which is in every way satisfactory, and recent examination by a committee appointed by this chamber demonstrates that the work already done is substantial and that the plan adopted by the board of engineers will, if carried to completion, surely accomplish the desired object of securing a permanent deep channel over the bar.

That there is urgent need that the work should be prosecuted vigorously and rapidly to insure speedy completion, and there is no doubt that if the work can be carried on without intermission the total cost may be reduced by thousands of dollars.

The chamber therefore urges upon Congress the importance of appropriating the full amount of $1,330,000 for the carrying on of the work the present year, as recommended by the Chief of Engineers; and, in order that the work shall be resumed at as early a day as possible, would suggest the advisability of assuring the engineer in charge that an appropriation commensurate with the importance of the work will be made, so that he may be in a position to call for bids on contracts for stone and other materials necessary before the resumption of the work.

By order of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., February 27, 1886.

J. Q. A. BOWLBY,
President Astoria Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., respectfully memoralize your honorable body to cause to be established a United States life-saving station at a suitable point on the south side of the entrance to the Columbia River, for the following reasons:

First. For the protection of the lives and property of the two thousand fishermen employed by the salmon canneries each year from the 1st of April to the 31st day of July, pursuing in open boat their dangerous calling in these waters.

Second. On account of the large annual increase of the number of vessels crossing in and out of the mouth of the Columbia River at all times of the year, exposing, as a matter of course, more and more lives to the dangers of the bar; also, the list of disasters which have in the past occurred to shipping, proves that more ships go ashore on the south than the north side of the entrance.

Third. That the ship-channel over the bar is much nearer the southern than the northern shore line at the mouth of the river, and in heavy weather in case of accident a life-saving crew stationed on the south side could rescue endangered lives long before it was possible for the crew on the north side, owing to the distance, to reach the scene of disaster.

This chamber would represent that during every fishing season the lives of many fishermen have been lost which might have been saved had the station now applied for been established. The salmon fishing grounds are nearest the southern shore, and it is not an unfrequent occurrence for fishing boats to be caught suddenly at the turn of the tide and capsize in the breakers; the occupants frequently regain their boat, but being unable to right it drift out to sea and are lost for want of that assistance a life-saving crew stationed here could render.

The cost of the establishment of a life-saving station at the point desired would be small as to the Government buildings made vacant by the removal of the troops from Fort Stevens could be utilized for the purpose.

Therefore, this chamber, in the interests of common humanity, urgently requests that this memorial may receive favorable consideration at your hands.

Ordered by the chamber, this 27th day of February, 1886.

President of Astoria Chamber of Commerce,

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Wabash, Oakland, and South Bend, in the State of Indiana, praying that liberal appropriations be made for public works, and especially for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Campello, Lowell, Milton, and Rockport, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BROWN. I present the petition of John W. Rankin, a member of the committee on legislation of the National Wholesale Druggists' Association, praying that the tax on alcohol to be used in medicine and the arts be materially reduced or that the act which imposes it be entirely repealed. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented resolutions adopted by local assemblies of Knights of Labor of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, and of Phœnixville, Pa., favoring the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Reading, Pa., remonstrating against the proposed increase of postage on fourth-class mail matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of 26 clergymen, 21 physicians, 1 lawyer, 64 teachers, 150 business men, and 54 officers of temperance and other societies, of Mercer and Armstrong Counties, Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by McLean Post, No. 16, Grand Army of the Republic, of Reading, Pa., favoring the passage of the bill pensioning ex-Union soldiers who were confined in confederate prisons; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the passage of the bill for the restoration of wages in the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition, numerously signed by property-holders and residents of the city of Washington, praying for the favorable consideration of the bill relating to the removal of steam-railroads within the city, and for the establishment of a union depot. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented petitions of the Knights of Labor of Salina and Wamego, in the State of Kansas, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of Peter O'Farrell, Frank H. Osborne, and James Whitlock, corresponding committee for the workingmen of Kansas, representing, in the first place, that Congress enacted that eight hours should be a day's work after June 25, 1868; second, that the workingmen who now claim compensation worked ten hours per day between June 25, 1868, and August 15, 1872; third, that they received extra pay for the time between June 25, 1868, and May 19, 1869; fourth, that payment was withheld from May 19, 1869, to August 15, 1872; fifth, that the claims for the additional compensation are audited and allowed to be correct and just; and the petitioners ask for an appropriation to pay the amount so found to be due.

I can only add, Mr. President, that I believe this claim is just and honest, and that the Government has been disgraced by its evasion of the law of Congress, and these claims are entitled to be paid.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., praying that the full amount of $1,330,000, estimated as the amount which can be profitably expended during the year by the engineer in charge, be appropriated for the improvement of the Columbia River, Oregon. A similar petition has been presented by my colleague and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg., praying for the establishment of a life-saving station on the south side of the mouth of the Columbia River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOLPH. At the last Congress an act was passed approved on the 31st of January, 1885, forfeiting a portion of the land grant of the Oregon Central Railroad Company between Portland and Astoria and McMinnville. There were lapping grants, the Northern Pacific having a grant for its main line from Portland to Puget Sound, which interfered with the grant of the Oregon Central. The settlers in Washington Territory on the north side of the Columbia River found the question as to the right of which company was entitled to the land under this grant, or would have been if the roads proceeded under the terms of the grant, undecided in the Land Office. When they undertook to file their claims under the provision of the second section of that act for the land upon which they had settled, the land officers at the local land office declined to receive their papers. The consequence is that there is a large number of settlers under that grant who have not been able to procure their titles. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria setting forth the facts and praying that the provisions of section 2 of the act of January 31, 1885, be extended for one year; and as the memorial is brief I will ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the memorial will be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

To the Representative of the Territory of Washington and the Representatives of the State of Oregon:

The Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, Oreg. desires to call your attention to the sad condition of affairs in Pacific, Wahkiakum, and perhaps part of Cowlitz Counties, in the Territory of Washington, owing to the forfeiture of the Oregon Central Railroad grant.

A great many settlers for the last ten years have been clearing and making homes upon lands in those counties purchased from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. When the act of forfeiture of the Oregon Central Railroad passed January 31, 1885, they paid no attention to it, as they did not think it affected their lands.

Some time in the summer or fall following, the honorable Commissioner ruled that the Oregon Central Railroad Company's grant extended across the Columbia River, and embraced many lands in the counties above named.

Owing to the lateness of the ruling and the confusion in the land office at Vancouver, many settlers did not become aware of their condition until the act of forfeiture had expired as to its protective features, which was January 31, 1886.

There is now much excitement and many attempted efforts to jump claims and take away the hard earnings of bona fide settlers. It is reported that at Skamokawa a vigilance committee of settlers has organized to protect themselves against jumpers. Those who have not exhausted pre-emption and homestead rights can yet protect themselves to the extent of 160 acres, but many have not those rights and are therefore without remedy if the ruling of the honorable Commissioner should be sustained. There are a few instances also of private corporations that are carrying on the business of canning, and perhaps other enterprises which have valuable improvements on the lands they occupy that seems not to have been provided for in the original forfeiture act.

This body then asks that you cause the second section of the act of January 31, 1885, to be extended another year, and that it be worded so as to include private corporations, or pass such other act or measure as would seem best adapted to protect the rights of these persons.

That you confer with the Land Department to the effect that late applicants under homestead and pre-emption laws holding under the railroad may be preferred to jumpers.

Ordered by the Chamber, February 27, 1886.

Respectfully,

J. Q. A. BOWLBY,
President Astoria Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a petition of the National Greenback party of the State of Iowa relating to various topics, chiefly in respect to public lands and the money of the country. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of Winneshiek County (Iowa) Friends, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of J. H. Coornish & Co. and a large number of other citizens of Osage, Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law requiring all imitations of butter and cheese manufactured or sold in the United States or used on the tables of public eating-houses to be labeled with a United States stamp; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petition of E. E. Herrick and a large number of citizens of Cherokee, Iowa, praying Congress to so amend the Constitution of the United States as to protect the women of all the States and Territories in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Saint Louis and Nevada, in the State of Missouri, praying that liberal appropriations be made for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of 31 clergymen, 14 physicians, 22 lawyers, 66 teachers, 175 business men, and 62 officers of temperance and other societies, of Saint Lawrence, Chenango, Madison, and Niagara Counties, State of New York, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of 26 citizens of Mansfield, Iowa, praying Congress to pass a joint resolution submitting to the several State Legislatures a proposition to so amend the Constitution of the United States as to protect the women of all the States and Territories in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of 17 clergymen, 8 physicians, 11 lawyers, 37 teachers, 106 business men, and 25 officers of temperance and other societies, of Humboldt and Hardin Counties, Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Muscotah, Kans., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Olean, N. Y., praying that liberal appropriations be made for internal improvements, and especially favoring the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of citizens of Saint Charles, Minnesota, praying for the passage of the bill granting an increase of pension to soldiers who have lost a limb; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 995) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 969) to authorize the employment of law clerks or stenographers for the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 925) to grant Dearborn Park, in the city of Chicago, to said city for the use and benefit of public and benevolent institutions, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill involves a mere question of law, and I do not see why it should go to the Committee on Public Lands. It certainly does not relate to public land. There is no land in the city of Chicago that is public land. The point involved is a mere technical question as to the title of the State of Illinois, and it is wholly a legal question. The question in reference to the title has been before the Judiciary Committee at a former Congress and reported upon. I hope that the bill will remain with the Judiciary Committee. I introduced the bill. I was on that committee at a time when the same question came up before, and I do not see anything in it except a question as to whether the land belongs to the State or whether it belongs to the city, and as to whether the Government has any interest in it or not.

Mr. JACKSON. The committee took a different view of the bill. As there had been a dedication of this land for public uses, the Judiciary Committee thought that the matter belonged appropriately to the Committee on Public Lands. I only reported it by direction of the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. The dedication was not a dedication to make it public land, but it was a dedication for a park for the city. It is a mere question as to whether the city has a right to sell, or whether the State has a right to sell, and whether the Government of the United States claims any title whatever in the property.

I hope the Senator from Tennessee will allow the bill to be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and if the Judiciary Committee will allow me to come before them, not to make an argument, but to call their attention to the preceding laws that have been passed in reference to the question, they will find that it is purely a legal question, and a question as to whether or not the Government of the United States has any title in the property at all. If not, the State or city can dispose of it. That is the whole question.

Mr. JACKSON. I certainly have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois to have the bill recommitted.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope it will be recommitted so that the matter may be further looked into.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 992) for the relief of Jerome Madden, of California, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1072) to prevent the publication of lottery advertisements, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 870) to provide that where any railroad property is taken into the possession of any United States court, and such railroad shall not have been completed, the net earnings of said railroad shall be applied to the completion of the same, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations. I ask for the present consideration of the bill, as it is of importance that it should be immediately passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was, in line 5, before the word "copies," to strike out "seven thousand five hundred" and insert "seventy-five thousand."

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the letter of the Postmaster-General be read showing the necessity for that change. The bill as it came from the House had a clerical error which the amendment is designed to correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1886.

SIR: I respectfully beg to call your attention to the bill (H. R. 4420) which has passed the House and in the Senate been referred to the committee of which you are chairman, because of a clerical error as it appears to have passed the House.

The number of copies authorized by the bill as I find it printed by the Senate is 7,500, while the bill as it was originally introduced was for 75,000 copies. By reference to the report made by Hon. Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing in the House (being Report No. 568) it will be seen that the committee intended to and did recommend 75,000 copies. The estimate given in the bill of $17,475 was for 75,000 copies, not for 7,500. It will be readily observed that every postmaster ought to have a copy of the Rules and Regulations, besides a good many other officers of the service. Sixty thousand copies of the Monthly Guide are distributed to the officials of the service. It is a fair estimate that a similar number of these regulations will be at once required for distribution, while 15,000 more will be kept in stock for further supply.

From these facts I presume the necessity for an amendment of the bill to conform to its original intention will be apparent.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

WM. F. VILAS,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill as amended will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for printing and publishing a new edition of the Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department, consisting of 75,000 copies, there is appropriated $17,475; such edition to be prepared under the direction of the Postmaster-General and printed at the Government Printing Office. No extra compensation shall be allowed to any officer or clerk of the Department in preparing or superintending the publication of such edition. The Postmaster-General may authorize the sale of copies of such edition, not needed for the use of the Department, to individuals, at the cost thereof with 10 per cent. added; the proceeds of such sales to be deposited in the Treasury as part of the postal revenues.

Mr. CONGER. Was the amendment to correct the number?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Instead of 7,500 to make the number 75,000?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was said to be a clerical mistake.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on March 13, 1886, approved and signed the act (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of California, and his sureties on his official bond; and

A bill (S. 178) for the relief of Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson and Caroline Augusta Urquhart.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1862) for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1863) for the relief of W. T. H. Forman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 1864) to establish a port of delivery at Fort Worth, in the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 1865) to pay I. C. Hamner, as administrator of George M. Hamner, deceased, the proceeds of certain cotton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAWYER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1866) to provide for the publication of the proceedings of the annual meetings of the national convention of chiefs and commissioners of labor bureaus of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1867) for the relief of Louisa Kearney; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 1868) providing for an extension of the Executive Mansion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1869) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I introduce two bills by request. I know nothing about them.

The bill (S. 1870) for the relief of S. Dingee & Co., their executors, heirs, and assigns, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 1871) for the relief of Daniel Webster Zantzinger was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 1872) granting a pension to Ellen M. Burpee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1873) for the relief of Calvin Gunn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1874) for the relief of the Iron Mountain Bank of Saint Louis, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1875) for the relief of Levi Koontz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1876) for the relief of Piromis H. Bell, administrator of Marcus A. Bell, deceased, and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1877) to repeal sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9 of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill and the accompanying papers, which I send to the desk, may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well; let the bill and papers be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator if the bill relates to the establishment of interior ports of entry?

Mr. COCKRELL. It relates in part to that, but more as to the mode of transporting imported merchandise into the interior ports.

Mr. CONGER. That subject has been under the charge of the Committee on Commerce heretofore. I hope it will not be divided All that subject of interior transportation of goods, their appraisal, and the custom-houses to which they are sent, and the ports, has been under the charge of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. My own judgment is that there are provisions in the bill which would properly go to both the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read, if it is short.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is quite a long bill.

Mr. CONGER. If it contains those subjects I hope it may go to the Committee on Commerce that has charge of them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, with the accompanying papers.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1878) granting a pension to Ann Lally; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WYCK (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1879) for the relief of William Wolff; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1880) for the completion of a public building at Nebraska City, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1881) granting a pension to Jared D. Schofield; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1882) to repeal parts of an act relating to tax on the business of real estate agents in the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1872; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1883) to refer the claim of the owners of the property known as Tift's Wharf, at Key West, Fla., to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1884) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1885) authorizing a survey of the Calumet River, in the State of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHANGE OF INAUGURATION DAY.

Mr. INGALLS. I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. As it is brief and relates to a subject of public interest, I ask that it may be read at length and then referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 55) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Whereas the first President of the United States was not inaugurated until the 30th day of April, 1789; and

Whereas the day which was chosen by the Continental Congress for the installation of the new government then established by the Constitution, the 4th day of March, does now cause a public inconvenience in unduly curtailing and limiting the second session of every Congress; and

Whereas it is fitting that the one hundredth anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as the first President of the United States be commemorated by the inauguration of his successor in 1889 upon the same day, and that this should be the day hereafter for the beginning of successive administrations of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as part of the Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"The term of office of the President and the second session of the Fiftieth Congress shall continue until the 30th day of April in the year 1889; and the 30th of April shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March, as the commencement of the official term of the successive Presidents, Vice-Presidents, and Congresses of the United States."

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 429) granting a pension to Harry McElhinny;
A bill (H. R. 473) granting a pension to William Boone;
A bill (H. R. 553) granting a pension to William J. Suffall;
A bill (H. R. 944) for the relief of Mary Jane Conrad;
A bill (H. R. 1548) for the relief of Ellen Crymble;
A bill (H. R. 1593) for the relief of Sarah Manz;
A bill (H. R. 1651) for the relief of Rosina Heineman;
A bill (H. R. 1652) for the relief of Frances Hasenzahl;
A bill (H. R. 1782) granting a pension to Cornelia W. Ellis;
A bill (H. R. 1816) granting a pension to Mary Ann Miller;
A bill (H. R. 1821) granting a pension to Daniel Kain;
A bill (H. R. 1990) granting a pension to John Hunter;
A bill (H. R. 2011) granting a pension to Joseph Chalfant;
A bill (H. R. 2193) granting a pension to Amelia M. Green;
A bill (H. R. 2254) for the relief of Jane M. Langley;
A bill (H. R. 3148) granting a pension to James W. Colville;
A bill (H. R. 3836) granting a pension to James Dunbar;
A bill (H. R. 4031) granting a pension to Rachel W. Heard;
A bill (H. R. 4111) granting a pension to Minerva T. Thompson;
A bill (H. R. 4219) granting a pension to Daniel Jacks;
A bill (H. R. 4374) to increase the pension of Samuel Frost;
A bill (H. R. 4400) granting a pension to Polly Belden;
A bill (H. R. 4517) granting a pension to Timothy Driscoll;
A bill (H. R. 4539) granting a pension to Ann Little;
A bill (H. R. 4589) granting a pension to Frederick Bauman;
A bill (H. R. 4615) for the relief of Ann Leddy;
A bill (H. R. 4723) granting a pension to Joseph E. Van Horn;
A bill (H. R. 4837) for the relief of Mary E. Whitehead;
A bill (H. R. 4960) granting a pension to Mary S. Webster;
A bill (H. R. 5038) for the relief of Stephen Sauer;
A bill (H. R. 5100) granting a pension to Eleanor Foust;
A bill (H. R. 5284) granting a pension to Rinaldo R. Somes;
A bill (H. R. 5331) granting a pension to Emma M. Shiner;
A bill (H. R. 5394) granting a pension to Sally Ann Bradley;
A bill (H. R. 5678) for the relief of Mrs. Martha A. Marble;
A bill (H. R. 5702) granting a pension to Jenet L. Johnson; and
A bill (H. R. 6389) granting a pension to Francis M. Moore.

The foregoing thirty-seven pension bills, received this day from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PUGH, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of I. B. Hamner, as administrator of George M. Hamner, deceased, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject of the letter of the Attorney-General be reprinted. I understand from the document office that the edition is exhausted, and there are no further copies for Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will allow, the occupant of the chair, to meet the demand for the report, has a resolution prepared covering the same subject, if he will accept it as a substitute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, with pleasure. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, together with the views of the minority, upon the letter of the Attorney-General declining to transmit official records and papers concerning the administration of the office of district attorney southern district of Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. Would it not be well, if so large a number of that document is to be printed containing all these other things, that the President's message should also be contained in the same document?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts make that motion?

Mr. HOAR. I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the message of the President be added.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will have to go to the Committee on Printing to get an estimate, and will require the concurrence of the other House, being extra copies, perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The cost will be less than $500.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the President's message the edition may cost more than $500.

Mr. HOAR. It is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, with the accompanying amendment, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In that view of the case, I renew my motion to reprint this document now wanted immediately, if the action of the other House is required on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the adoption of an order, which will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is merely a motion for a reprint of the committee's report, which is not usually put into the form of a written order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made if there be no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOAR. If the morning business is over, I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 9.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to inquire whether that is to be considered under Rule VIII?

Mr. HOAR. No; I propose to take it up, not under Rule VIII, and proceed to its consideration.

Mr. FRYE. Then it will occupy the attention of the Senate and be the unfinished business at the close of the day?

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that that makes it unfinished business. It merely takes the remainder of the morning hour until 2 o'clock.

Mr. FRYE. That is the inquiry which I meant to address to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Then it requires another action of the Senate to take it up again. But I hope it may be completed this morning if we proceed to its consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the President of the Senate to rule on that parliamentary question, that if a bill is taken up by a vote of the Senate during the morning hour it is not displaced by the arrival of 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I did not so understand it.

Mr. INGALLS. That I understood to be the ruling of the presiding officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it was not displaced?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; that is to say, that the consideration of the bill continued beyond 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not ask that it go beyond 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that he ever so decided.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 545.

Mr. INGALLS. Let its title be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before this matter passes away, lest the Senate may fall into a misapprehension as to the effect of the adoption of such a motion, the Chair will state that he did not undertake to decide that when a bill was taken up within the morning hour it displaced the unfinished business coming up at 2 o'clock; but in the particular case to which the Senator from Kansas refers the unfinished business itself was the bill taken up on motion in the morning hour and continued; and such was the decision of the Chair in that case.

Mr. INGALLS. I am unable to understand how the fact that the unfinished business was the bill that was taken up could change the parliamentary law. Still I agree with the Chair in its present ruling, and am very glad to know that it has reversed its former opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was founded entirely on the fact stated.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] rose to address the Chair. The pending motion is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to ask unanimous consent. I suppose the motion of the Senator from Nebraska is not in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, it is.

Mr. HOAR. Let me make my statement, please. I suppose when a motion is made to take up one bill that it is not in order under the rules of the Senate to move to amend that motion by proposing to take up another; but if the bill which the Senator from Nebraska refers to is the pension bill, which he has under charge, I shall not press my motion, but shall give way to his motion, giving notice that to-morrow morning, or whenever that is out of the way, I shall renew this motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 545.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Nebraska wishes to take up the pension bill, of which he has already given notice several times, I do not desire to have this bill and that put in an antagonism to each other. I, therefore, will withdraw my motion for the time being, giving notice that to-morrow morning, the pension bill being out of the way, I shall try to call up the Presidential count bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill moved by the Senator from Nebraska will be read by its title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pension of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to give way informally to take up a House bill which was recommitted to the Committee on Finance for the purpose of amendment. That amendment having been agreed upon by the Committee on Finance, it is rather important that the bill should be passed promptly. I ask, therefore, that House bill 5544 be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up for consideration the bill indicated by him, displacing temporarily the pending order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It will not lead to debate?

Mr. MORRILL. No.

DUTIES OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be taken up subject to objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, page 2, after the word "the" where it occurs the third time in the line, insert the words "Treasurer of the."

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that the Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended by the committee. That will show conclusively how it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill as it will stand as amended, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows, the amendment being to strike out the words between brackets [ ] and to insert the words in italics:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 304. The Treasurer may, in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the assistant treasurer to act in the place and discharge any or all the duties of the Treasurer of the United States; and in the event of the absence or illness of either the Treasurer or the assistant treasurer [or himself, the Treasurer, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, may] or both, the Secretary of the Treasury may, on the nomination of the Treasurer, appoint, for a term not exceeding thirty days at one time, from among the clerks in the Treasury, any one of said clerks to be acting assistant treasurer during such absence or illness: Provided, however, That no such appointment shall be made until the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be [held] made in terms to cover and apply to the acts and defaults of the persons so appointed [to act in his place in such cases]. Such acting officer shall, moreover, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the assistant treasurer, for whom he acts."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems to me that the word "nomination," in line 13, is inappropriate, and I suggest that it be stricken out and that the word "recommendation" be inserted in place of it.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no objection to that. The word "nomination" is the usual phraseology, however.

Mr. INGALLS. "Nomination of the Treasurer?"

Mr. MORRILL. Yes; but I have no objection to the word "recommendation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, strike out "nomination" and insert "recommendation," so as to read, "on the recommendation of the Treasurer, appoint," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment to the amendment of the committee will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee as amended.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the temporary appointment of an acting assistant treasurer."

PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "month," to strike out:

And nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years.

And to insert:

And in addition thereto the pension of widows shall be increased at the rate of $4 per month for each child under the age of eighteen years, of the husband on account of whose death the claim has been or shall be granted, which shall be in lieu of the rate of $2 per month allowed by existing law for children under the age of sixteen years; and when such child or children shall, under section 4703 of the Revised Statutes, receive less than $4 per month, such child or children shall, in addition, be paid so as to make such pension $4 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The amendment increasing the pension of minor children to $4 per month having been agreed to by the Senate as recommended by the Committee on Pensions, I desire to have two other amendments adopted. These amendments are in keeping with the subject-matter of this bill. They are precisely the same features that were placed by the Senate upon a House bill during the last session of Congress.

I do not desire any postponement of this bill by any means; but I desire that the bill should embrace what properly belongs to it—the same features precisely and only those that were placed upon a House bill at the last session of Congress by the Senate. If the Senate will bear with me a moment I will refresh their recollection when I call their attention to the fact that during the last Congress a private bill to give a pension to one Sarah B. Jackson came from the House, and the Senate, as they deemed it proper, attached an amendment to that bill increasing the pensions of widows from eight to twelve dollars per month. They also proposed that pensions of dependent relatives, fathers, and mothers should be increased from $8 to $12 per month; and the Senate also placed this amendment upon the bill, which was perfectly germane to it:

SEC. —. That in considering the claims of dependent parents the fact and cause of death and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such dependent parent is without other present means of comfortable support than his or her own manual labor, or the contributions of others not legally bound for his or her support; and such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from the date of this act.

That amendment, together with the increase of the widow's pension, was placed upon the House bill one year ago. Now, whatever may be the fate of this amendment to-day, I desire to allude to it for this reason: Senators know and the country knows that the Senate has already been arraigned, charged with neglect of duty in not more speedily passing the increase of pensions to widows and dependent relatives. I refer to this fact now to show that the Senate did its full measure of duty one year ago and placed it as an amendment on a House bill, and in the House the amendment was assented to by the House committee, and if it had then been passed, during the year past and gone the beneficiaries of this provision would have been receiving the benefit of it. The trouble was that the House chose rather to spend its time in a contested-election case and was determined to make no concession for any legislation, however wise and provident, and the only concession made was when they relinquished long enough to allow a bill to pass to place General Grant upon the retired-list.

The facts show that the Senate was not subject to that criticism, and all I ask now is that just what the Senate then presented to the House and what the House committee assented to shall be placed in this bill. Some friends say put it in an omnibus bill. Certainly not. I did take occasion a few days ago to say that I believed every measure of pension or of increase should stand upon its own merits. I took occasion to say that in regard to the Mexican pension bill, which has sometimes been loaded with amendments, I said that that should stand upon its own merits. In consequence of that remark of mine the statement has been made that I was more willing to give to the Mexican war soldiers a pension than I was to give it to the soldiers of the Union Army for disability and to their dependents, which is not so. I would give it more readily to the latter than to the former, but I would give to both, and I would let each measure be considered standing on its own merits.

There is no omnibus bill where this clause can be inserted. This is the bill providing for the pensions of dependent relatives and parents. We provide an increase from $8 to $12, and here above all other places should be inserted the amendment I have just read and which, as I have stated, was placed upon a House bill at the last session by the Senate. I did propose also, which has been sought for a long time as a matter of justice, to add another amendment:

In case such minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless, the said pension shall continue and be paid during the existence of said disabilities.

And if a provision of that kind should be placed in the pension law, there is no other place where it so properly belongs. We are providing for the pensions of minors, and if the Senate believes that an idiotic or insane or helpless child should receive the same pension which it received during its infancy or up to eighteen years of age, here and now is the proper place to put the provision. Is it not necessary that a child surrounded by those conditions should receive a pension as much as one under sixteen or eighteen years of age, who is perfectly well and active? It will not do to say, as is sometimes argued, that the State makes provision. The State makes provision in the poor-house for the idiotic; but I trust that argument will not be adduced here as a reason why the idiotic or insane child of the soldier should be turned into the poor-house.

Mr. President, these are the only two propositions I desire to insert, and I only ask for these because the main one was inserted in the very bill which we proposed last session. That they are legitimate and proper and can in themselves receive no opposition, I think is clear.

The Senate was anxious one year ago, and it is anxious to-day, that this bill shall speedily become a law; and whatever amendments the Senate places upon this bill—one has been placed upon it already—it will be no more delayed by putting these two features upon the bill, which will be but little expense to the Government and will be the recognition of a correct and proper principle. Their insertion will make no further delay because I will say to Senators that I propose after this disagreement, as has been done in other cases, to ask at once that a committee of conference may be appointed, which will make this a privileged question in the House and secure prompt action. If the House refuse to accede, then certainly it will be in the power of the Senate to withdraw the amendments and pass the bill simply as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator to offer an amendment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer the two amendments which I have indicated.

Mr. SEWELL. The proposition coming from the House was simply an increase of the widow's pension from eight to twelve dollars a month. The committee, recognizing the analogy of the child to the widow, thought that it would be germane to the bill to increase the pension to the children, which has been a subject mooted for some time; and the committee, and I think the members of the Senate generally, recognize that it is an act of justice that the present pension of $2 a month shall be increased, as is proposed by the committee in this bill, to $4, and that the time during which it is enjoyed shall extend from sixteen to eighteen years of age.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from New Jersey explain why the increase of the age from sixteen to eighteen years is made?

Mr. SEWELL. Simply because children at the age of sixteen are not very well able to take care of themselves; they have not received that class of education which would enable them at the present day to have the necessary information to make a livelihood for themselves.

The propositions that the Senator from Nebraska desires to add to this bill were considered by the committee; and while they would be willing to report and probably will report them in another bill, they were not willing that they should be attached to this one. Delay may be occasioned by that course. I think the passage of this bill is an act of justice to the widows and children, and it ought not to be delayed by tacking on to it any proposition. I hope the Senate will not entertain the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I said when this bill was up before that I hoped it would pass the Senate as it came from the House. My object then was merely to suggest that a fear existed that something might befall it in going back again, and the amendments might not be agreed to. But the committee have agreed to increase the rate of pensions of children to $4 a month. I shall make no opposition to that so far as I am individually concerned, although I think it would have been better to pass the bill just as it came from the House, and report these other propositions in a separate bill; but this amendment having been adopted, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not encumber it with others. I know his interest in people of this kind who are unfortunate and his desire to promote their comfort, and it is very commendable in him; but I trust he will not offer these amendments, not that I am opposed to them, for I am ready to vote for them in a separate bill, and will do anything I can individually to promote their passage if they are so reported, but I hope they will not be offered to this bill. This bill having been amended once, if the Senate pass it as amended, and then ask for a committee of conference on that particular subject, you may get the bill through soon; but if amended in several respects so as to go to the other House presenting various questions some doubt may arise as to whether it will finally pass or not.

I hope that neither House will be responsible for the defeat of this bill at this session. I do not mean to say that either the House or the Senate desires such a thing; but it is unfortunate sometimes that bills are defeated without intention on the part of either House by amendments which delay them and embarrass them so that they can not be agreed to. I know that bills have been lost in that way in both Houses where both Houses were for the body of the bill and the principle involved in it. So I trust the Senator will not offer any further amendment, with the understanding that these amendments that he now proposes (at least I will say so for myself) are not objectionable in a bill that may be reported from the committee and doubtless will pass the Senate and then go to the House, and they can take it up as well as take up this bill. So I hope the bill will not be embarrassed.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to make a suggestion simply. It seems to me that one of the amendments proposed by the Senator from Nebraska introduces a new subject into the bill, that of dependent relatives, and I agree with the Senator from Illinois that it is perhaps as well under the circumstances to withhold that, as it is not strictly germane to the subject of widows' pensions. But our committee have very appropriately considered the question of an increase of pensions to children as directly connected with the widows' pension, because in certain cases it goes to the widow in contributing to the support of the children. Our committee here have extended the age to eighteen years; that amendment has been agreed to by the Senate. It seems to me that the other amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, namely, that in case of mental or physical disability the pension should be continued as long as that disability continues, is directly in the line of the amendment which the committee has agreed to; and if one of the Senator's amendments should be dropped and the other agreed to, it seems to me the bill would be in a shape where no objection could be taken to it in its consideration in the House. We have extended the period to eighteen years, and the Senator from New Jersey has justified that extension in what he has said. Now, is it not entirely germane to say that in case either from physical or mental cause the period of infancy, the period of inability and of dependence, is extended beyond eighteen years of age, the pension should be continued during the continuance of the disability?

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the prime mistake, as it appears to me, has been in agreeing to any amendment whatever to this bill. I desired that this proposition submitted to us by the House, confessedly just, to which there can be no objection, should be promptly agreed to by the Senate and thus have an end of it. That was a distinct proposal to increase the rate of widows' pensions from eight to twelve dollars a month. The committee have seen fit to report, and the Senate has seen fit to adopt in Committee of the Whole, an amendment which, as the Senator from Indiana says, is germane, but that has done all the mischief that is anticipated from delay. We had it in our power this morning by a simple vote on the bill as it came from the House to confer unspeakable happiness upon thousands of widowed women in this country, simply by agreeing to this bill as it came from the House of Representatives without any amendment, and then it would have gone forward for signature to the President and would have been approved, and that would have been the end of it, so far as concerned us. Now by agreeing to that amendment the bill goes back to the House. The Senator from Nebraska says that there is to be a committee of conference asked for, which makes it privileged. Very true; but it still renders it liable to delay. There still remains the difficulty of the consideration of the bill, the possibility of a want of agreement between the committees of the two Houses; and therefore the postponement of what is admitted by everybody to be a measure that ought to pass, that has the concurrence of all men of both parties in both Houses of Congress.

Now, where is the wisdom in amending this bill at all? But, it having been amended, I want to ask the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Illinois how is it logically possible now to reject any amendments which are appropriate? Why should not the Senate, having amended the bill by the addition of a new feature, add those now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska which are equally just and advantageous? I can see no objection to that, and the bill having been amended, I am not able to justify myself in voting against those amendments. I should be glad to do so, if the opportunity could be offered to vote against all amendments to the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. That question will come up in the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. But unless the amendment already adopted can be disagreed to in the Senate, there is no logical reason for resisting any amendment that is agreed to be just and wise. I should hope, therefore, that the Senator from Nebraska when this bill reaches the Senate would ask for a reconsideration and that the amendment might not be agreed to, to the end that by concurring this morning in this particular bill we may have an end of the subject and leave these other matters to be considered when other bills come up hereafter.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator from Indiana desires, although the two amendments I have proposed are both properly germane to this bill, that one of them should be withdrawn, while he thinks it is proper to adopt the other. I have no other feeling or desire about this matter than every other Senator on the floor. I fail to understand the force of the proposition that as when this bill came from the House it contained something that all of us desired we should pass it without amendment. I can not call to mind that the Senate have refused to place in a bill matters which were germane to the subject, which they equally as much desired. The Senate, as I have stated, more than a year ago desired all these propositions to be incorporated into the statutes. It was no fault of the Senate that that was not secured; neither do I propose to say that it was any fault of the House. It is a matter of regret that subjects of pension should be used as foot-balls between political parties. It is a subject too sacred and too important to have any consideration of that kind attached to it. I alluded to what occurred last year only to show that the Senate was not liable to the criticism which had been charged against it. I charge no political considerations there or here, because none properly attach to the subject.

I remember when the Mexican pension bill came to the Senate, Senators believed that that was a just and true measure; it should have been passed alone upon its merits; yet that did not prevent the Senate committee from placing various amendments upon it, and it did not prevent Senators from voting for those amendments. Those amendments connected all the wars with the Mexican war; they were not germane properly except that they were generally on the subject of pensions. Why did not the consideration prevail then that we should place no amendment upon the Mexican pension bill? That view could have been urged then with far more force. These subjects, if not placed in this bill, can be placed in no other and will be placed in no other.

This House bill re-enacts in terms that the pension for minors shall be $2 per month. We have been told time and again of the great generosity of the American people toward those who fought its battles and their wives and their children. We have been told that we are the grandest nation on the earth in paying pensions. We ought to be, whether we are or not; but merely the fact that the minor child was turned off with a beggarly $2 per month we could not point to with a great deal of pride as evidencing very great generosity! Two dollars per month! Would you re-enact that to-day? Would you propose now to say that the minor child should receive only $2 per month? Yet this bill contains it, contains it as a distinct proposition that the minor child shall receive $2 per month. Do the Senators desire to vote for $2 a month as a square proposition for the minor child? Yet this bill as it came from the House had that clause in which Senators would be required to vote for if they voted for the bill just as it came here. These are the words:

> And nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years.

Why not say with some little generosity, of which we claim a great deal, that a minor child shall not receive less than $4 per month? We do not imperil this bill by that. The crippled and the insane child, I propose, shall receive $4 per month while the disability lasts. Who can object to that? We are legislating for widows. There are not many of them left and not many of the children left under the ages here specified. But if there are any, should they live in Washington and the boy is old enough to ride up Capitol Hill on horseback, you have a heartless corporation here which makes him work fifteen or sixteen hours a day. This minor child works for the street-car companies fifteen or sixteen hours a day for a few cents; and yet we claim that we are a generous Christian people! We are legislating in this bill about widows and dependent relatives and minor children; and the committee has proposed to put a small increase for minor children. It is said, put no dead weight on this bill. Why, sir, this slight increase belongs to the minors, and they ought to have it, as well as the widows who make 25 cents a day in the city of Washington being employed from morning to night. Actually a soldier's widow can make 25 cents a day sewing from morning to night, and the minor child working fifteen or sixteen hours a day can get a few cents!

What has started this sudden spasm that it will not do to perfect the bill? We had no such caution a year ago; but this bill necessitates a new rule that we have never had before, and that is, what is germane and proper to the bill shall not be put there, when the Senate put all this there one year ago. It was submitted to their consideration, and they believed it to be right.

Now Senators know that a refusal to put these amendments here is a defeat of these measures, because there is no other bill to which they can be properly proposed as amendments. There never will be time to consider them as an independent measure, and they will pass here or they will not pass at all, and the question is whether they can pass at all.

We see it stated in some of the papers in the money centers that there must be more conservatism on this matter of pensions. Introduce your conservatism, but do not strike the widow who makes only 25 cents a day by stitching from morning until night; do not strike the father and mother who are almost at the grave; do not strike the minor who can get a few shillings a day by working fifteen hours a day. Conservatism does well sometimes, but here it springs only from the money centers and on pension grants. They are not so conservative about other things, but the pension grants are alarming things, especially when the pension goes to the widow, the worn-out father and mother, or the minor child!

We all like economy. Oh, yes, it is all very well; but this cry springs from the money centers. It does not come from the great muscle of this land that pays the most taxes. The people who toil are not finding fault with what you pay out for pensions. The complaint does not come from the workshop, or the farm, or the counter. Oh, no; but the money centers have become alarmed! You see it in the great city of New York. An elegant statue was proposed to be erected, and a great city with its host of millionaires can not find money enough to build even the pedestal to hold it, and they appeal to others for aid; to the men who drive the street-cars, who work for sixteen or seventeen hours a day, and who then do not get money enough to break their fast. They are appealed to to raise enough money to complete a pedestal to receive the great work of Bartholdi. In the city of New York is the body of the great Grant. They have a great committee, of six hundred, I believe, to do what? To beg of the poor soldiers and car-drivers to pay out money enough to erect a monument to Grant in the city of New York. That is whence the complaint comes about the enormity of the pension-list?

Mr. President, I have only one duty to perform in this matter. I suppose if it was proper one year ago for the Senate, after mature consideration, to pass all of these provisions, it is proper they should be re-enacted now. There is no danger of delay. We can secure action by the House. There is no likelihood of adding too much to the pension-roll. There is not a minor child on the pension-roll but would ask my friend from Illinois and my friend from New Jersey and my friend from Kansas to stop just long enough to protect this very class. In whose interest do they oppose the amendment? In the interest of the pensioners? No; because their interest lies in a completion of this bill. The mother's interest lies in giving her minor $4 a month. The dependent relative is obliged by the fact that you can make a legislative declaration that if her poverty exists to-day she shall be entitled to be considered a pensioner.

There need be no delay. A committee of conference can be asked for at once. Certainly that request will be heeded by the House, for they take great pride in this measure. They say it is their own bill, and they desire to have all the glory of it, and I am willing they should have; but I would rather add to that glory by making the bill more perfect, and it will take but a trifle out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. How much?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not very much. We have already put in a clause raising the pension of minors from two to four dollars per month. I have a statement of the number benefited. The number of children on the pension-roll, as shown by the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year expiring June 30, 1885, was 16,332. It may be a matter of interest to know that the total number of minor children who are on the pension-roll as such is 2,252, the total number of widows with children who are on the pension-roll is 7,770, making a total of 10,022, and the whole number of children in all on the roll is 16,332.

As I said, all persons interested in this House bill are interested in the amendments which I propose, and they would gladly beg you, if they could be heard, that you should put these amendments on even though the effect should be to require two or three or four days more to pass the bill. As I say, we propose a committee of conference, which will be a privileged question in the House, and then if the House refuse it it is an easy matter for the Senate to recede from its amendments. The Senate at least will be going in that direction and doing those things which they believe ought to be done and which one year ago they did do.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the amendments which are being pressed by the Senator from Nebraska were considered in the committee, and there was strong support of them and some dissent from the majority report. I said myself to the Senator that if he saw fit to move the amendments I would support them in the Senate so far as I was concerned. The committee had agreed to an amendment which compelled the return of the bill to the House. That point being fixed, I could see no reason why these other topics which are cognate to the bill itself and which are as meritorious as the bill itself should not also be considered in connection with it.

The necessity of an increase of the widow's pension all admit; but the widow is as a rule younger than the parent of the soldier. The class of dependent relatives who are provided for only in case of necessity are very old people as a whole, and they are fast passing away. Any delay in relief comes to them with especial hardship; and if any class justly should receive the help of the country who are not now provided for it is certainly these aged dependent parents. They can not wait; and it seems to me that we ought to consider their case now if we do anybody's.

We have increased the pension to the minor children from two to four dollars. We have already extended the age from sixteen to eighteen years. Both those points are already concurred in by the Senate so far as the children are concerned; then there is only one other class to be provided for by legislation, and that is the minor who is physically or mentally disabled continuing after the age of sixteen, or as it now will be of eighteen years, to be so disabled.

The reason why the minor child is provided for up to sixteen and has been by the general law hitherto is, of course, his minority, his disabilty either mental or physical or both, to provide for himself. All the reason that there is for providing for the minor child at all continues to exist as long as the disability exists; and, certainly, the disability of a minor child at the age of sixteen who is without mind or without body, or without both, is greater than that of any healthy child, mentally and physically, who has reached that age. It seems to be exceedingly unjust on the part of the Government to pass these disabled minor children, mentally and physically disabled—to pass them over to the support of the ordinary pauper establishments of the country. So great an outrage has this been considered on our sense of justice that in every instance as far as I know, when a relief by special act has been asked for, the Senate and House have concurred at once in the justice of the claim by passing a bill. There are some scattered all over the country, and there is a class who find it especially difficult to reach the Government in search of the aid that they are entitled to, and by a general provision they ought to be provided for.

So it seems to me that this appeals to the sense of justice of all classes so strongly that every one of these points should be considered without opposition in the House, and the sensible thing for us to do will be to provide for all at once. It will save future bills, future discussions, and future consideration in both Houses and will put an end to the matter by doing justice to all these several parties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is now pending.

Mr. MORRILL. I have received a great many letters urging me to promote the passage of the widows' pension bill. I have not received any in relation to any other part of the subjects presented, and I have regretted that this bill should have been so long delayed. I also regret now that there is any amendment to it. I foresee that the bill will be delayed by considerations as to the propriety of increasing the age from sixteen to eighteen years, and also as to the amount that will be involved. I shall vote against all amendments, but I shall vote for the bill whether the amendments be adopted or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. INGALLS. What became of the amendments offered by the Senator from Nebraska?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not yet been offered; the Senator said he would offer them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I read the amendments which I propose to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has not sent them to the Chair.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator from Missouri will allow me. At the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana I am willing that the first amendment which I read shall be withdrawn; but I shall insist on the second amendment which provides for the idiotic or insane children.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska now offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the word "month" in section 1, line 20:

And in case said minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless, that the said pension shall continue and be paid during the existence of either of said disabilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to address the Chair?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not. I simply wished to know the condition of the bill, so that when it came into the Senate objection could be made to the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator make some explanation of that amendment?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to, and I hope when the Senate acts on the amendment already passed upon in Committee of the Whole it will be rejected.

This matter was considered in the Committee on Pensions. The committee was not full, but some members who were there were very reluctant to interfere at all with the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. I for one prefer very much to pass the bill just as it came from the House. Very liberal provision is made by the bill in regard to widows, which I believe received the unanimous concurrence of the committee, and then came this proposed amendment to raise the allowance to minor children from two to four dollars a month, which did risk and endanger the passage of the bill by Congress. It looks to me very doubtful whether the bill can be got through if it is amended in this way.

The Senator from Nebraska has alluded to a matter which we had before the Committee on Education and Labor, where the wages to sewing women was agitated. The Senator from Nebraska appeared before that committee and examined witnesses, and it was found that there was one woman somewhere in the District of Columbia, a maiden lady, by the way, who had no children to provide for, who said she was making a certain article of clothing on which she made 25 cents a day wages; and yet she rented a room, dressed very respectably, and appeared to be in good health. I stated to the Senator from Nebraska that it seemed a little singular that the wages of laboring women in the District of Columbia should be so low. There appeared an agent of some sort of society here to assist women, who made some very interesting statements before that committee. She had found this aged woman who got 25 cents a day. But she went further and charged—and I refer to this only to show the unreliable nature of such testimony—that in this city there existed a state of things which she alleged to be true and capable of proof, that there were eight hundred women in the Departments under this Government indirectly supported there for the accommodation of members of Congress and officers of the Departments. I merely refer to this to show that my friend from Nebraska appears to have been a little upset in his calm judgment in reference to these matters by testimony adduced from sources that could make such statements.

I hope the Senate is not disposed to be carried away by the sympathies and the eloquence of my friend from Nebraska. If we pass this bill as suggested by the honorable Senator from Vermont as it came from the House, all agree to its propriety in the House and in this body, and so much can be accomplished; but if we go beyond it and take up the idiotic and the insane and the otherwise helpless children in the United States, it will be very difficult for the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee on Finance to estimate the draft that will be made upon the Treasury.

I trust, therefore, that not only will this amendment now offered by the Senator from Nebraska be disapproved by the Senate, but that in the Senate we shall get rid of the other amendment already adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am opposed to any amendment, and I shall vote "nay."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] who has been called out of the Senate for a few moments.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DOLPH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. I withhold my vote, not knowing how he would vote.

Mr. SEWELL. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON] who is absent.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Blair,	Evarts,	Miller,	Teller,
Bowen,	Gray,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.

Fair,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Sewell,
Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,	Stanford,
George,	Jones of Nevada.	Platt,	Vest.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolutions reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] from the Committee on the Judiciary, February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers, on which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is entitled to the floor.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HAHN.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, conveyed to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana, and communicated the action of the House thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I feel it my duty to yield to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], who desires to make a motion in connection with the announcement just made from the House of Representatives.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, it is my melancholy duty to announce to the Senate the death of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, a Representative of the State of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). Will the Senator pause till the message referred to shall be laid before the Senate?

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 15, 1886.

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a select joint committee, consisting of seven members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral, and to escort the remains of the deceased to their place of burial, and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of these resolutions.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. EUSTIS. I offer the following resolutions and move their adoption:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the appointment of a joint committee to take order for superintending the funeral and escort the remains of the deceased to the place of burial, and that the members of the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. EUSTIS. As an additional mark of respect to the memory of Mr. HAHN I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee will be named during the day. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to unanimously; and (at 2 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 15, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., as follows:

Almighty God, we bow before Thee in reverence, stillness, and humility. In its last session this House stood in the presence of the coffined dead and paid its tribute of respect to the memory of a departed Senator. Since then the blows of death have fallen twice upon this House. The wife of a Member has been called away, and now a Member has passed through the gate of death. We humbly beseech Thee to comfort and cheer the bereaved, the husband and the children of the departed wife, the wife and children of the departed Member. Oh, come Thou unto them with the only solace and consolation which can cheer in such an hour. Release us all from the gloomy superstitions concerning death which have held the minds of men in terror for so many ages, and may the light of Christ's life and resurrection shine into our hearts and upon our paths, and may we comprehend that death is only the passage to another life—a higher, a nobler life for the good and virtuous man true to his principles, true to his duty, his country, and his God; and bring us all at last, whether our earthly life be brief or long, to rejoice in Thy presence and in the higher activities of Thy upper kingdom. We pray, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Friday and Saturday were read and approved.

DEATH OF HON. MICHAEL HAHN.

Mr. ST. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce the death of my colleague, Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, a Representative from Louisiana, who died last night at his lodgings in this city. I will not detain the House now with any remarks of tribute to his memory. Meanwhile I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a select joint committee, consisting of seven members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to their place of burial, and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of these resolutions.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. Pending the question on those resolutions I ask that the order of business of to-morrow be considered as of Monday for the introduction of bills, &c.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that to-morrow may be set apart for the transaction of the same business which would be in order to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

The objection of Mr. SPRINGER was subsequently withdrawn.

The SPEAKER again submitted Mr. BLAND'S request for unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. That includes motions for the suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I object.

Mr. MILLS. I feel no concern in regard to the introduction of bills, but we ought to have one day in a month on which the committees can be called.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to the committees being called.

Mr. MILLS. That is all we ask.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], he does object to the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. No; but to individual motions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow may be set apart for the transaction of the same character of business that would be in order to-day, which includes the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions offered by Mr. ST. MARTIN were then adopted unanimously.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE HAHN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced as the members of the committee on the part of the Senate to escort the remains of the late Representative HAHN to the place of burial in the State of Louisiana, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. BUTLER.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of January 29, 1886, copies of drawings and report of a recent survey of the Nicaraguan canal route made by Civil Engineer A. G. Menocal, United States Navy; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers are on the table of the Secretary—a large bundle.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the papers be printed, and, with the letter, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is of great public importance, and therefore, although they are voluminous, as I know something of their nature, I think it necessary that they should be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the communication and the accompanying papers be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. CONGER. Why should the matter go to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not for the Chair to answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state to my friend from Michigan that the subject of building that canal in a foreign country, and the relations of the United States to it, has always been considered as properly referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the Senator may remember on some recent occasions, bills reported, and all that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan make any motion in respect to the reference?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; I will not make any motion in regard to it. However, I should like to have that committee examine the subject carefully, and I am willing to leave it there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That we certainly shall do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers are referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 3d instant, a report of the Adjutant-General showing dates of transfer to the Interior Department of abandoned and other military reservations; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of December 17, 1885, information in relation to land-grant railroads in the State of Kansas; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication, and the accompanying papers, which are voluminous, will lie on the table.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Washington Gas-light Company, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 3d instant, certain information in regard to the capital stock, dividends, &c., of that company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Mrs. Lyndall, Mrs. Savage, Mrs. McNeil, and 115 other citizens of Columbus, Ohio, praying for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the United States Constitution prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Dover, Ohio, monthly meeting of Friends, praying for the passage of Senate bill 355, to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of a considerable number of clergymen, physicians, lawyers, teachers, business men, and officers of temperance and other societies, all residing in the State of Vermont, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury. I believe that bill has been reported.

Mr. MORRILL. Favorably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Favorably. I ask that the petition be laid on the table, and I hope the committee having the bill in charge will get it up as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Salem, Oreg., praying that liberal appropriations be made from the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvements of national importance, and heartily indorsing the plan for the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the National Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Portland, Me., praying for legislation in favor of the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Providence, R. I., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal and other works of internal improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of Baltimore, Md., praying that the Government make liberal appropriations of the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement and of national importance, and among other works for the construction of the Hennepin Canal and the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Mrs. Charlotte A. Cleveland, Mrs. Henry Stagg, and 42 other citizens of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the United States Constitution prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Franklin Rives and others, proprietors of the Congressional Globe building and grounds, in Washington, praying for the purchase of that property for the use of the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented the petition of Dr. O. M. Wozencraft, praying for quarantine regulations against infected cattle; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. DAWES presented petitions of Knights of Labor of North Adams and Rockport, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for liberal appropriations for public works, and especially for the speedy construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of Post No. 69, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, praying for legislation in accordance with the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic with relation to pensions, which are set forth in the petition itself. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of Prosperity Local Assembly No. 3611, Knights of Labor, of New Hampshire, praying for the organization of a Territorial form of government over the Indian Territory, the opening up of the Indian Territory to settlement under the homestead laws, the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on their present reservations, and the purchase of the surplus lands of the reservations, to the end that the land may be saved from speculators. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I also present the petition of David Morrison, of Raymond, N. H., who is connected with the Grand Army of the Republic, Post No. 51, in that State, in which he sets forth his views upon some public questions of the day, and desires their proper consideration. He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Marshall, Harrison County, Texas, praying that liberal expenditures of the public money be made in works of public improvement and for the passage of a bill providing for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 477) to allow drawback on imported materials used in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigars exported from the United States, to report it adversely, and to ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE], who is interested in the subject, is now absent from the Chamber, I suggest that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 476) to repeal section 3151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning inspectors of tobacco and cigars, to report it adversely. I may say that the chief feature of the bill is to make a change so that the Government will have to assume the expense of inspection instead of the manufacturer and the exporter. The committee thought that as the matter is entirely under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to fees, they might be reduced to any point, if they are exorbitant at the present time, so as to make them less exorbitant. Therefore the bill is reported adversely, but I ask that it may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 674) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Mitchell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1363) granting a pension to William Blanchard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 231) granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1490) to amend article 103 of the Rules and Articles of War, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

GOVERNMENT SURVEYS, ETC.

Mr. ALLISON. The joint commission appointed under the act of July 7, 1884, consisting of three members of the House and three members of the Senate, to consider the organization of the Signal Service, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Geological Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department with a view to secure greater efficiency and economy of administration, instruct me to report the testimony and to ask that it may be printed. I will say that at no distant day we hope to make a further report upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa, from the joint commission indicated by him, submits the testimony taken by the commission, and asks that it be printed. That order will be made if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1887) for the relief of certain persons who were discharged from the military service of the United States because they were minors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1888) granting a pension to Nathan Collins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1889) for the relief of Anna Dummett, sister and only heir of Capt. Douglass Dummett, deceased, late a pensioner of the United States, for injuries received in the old Florida and Indian war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 1890) for the relief of A. L. Shotwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1891) for the relief of D. W. Price; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1892) granting an increase of pension, by way of arrears, to Maria A. Rousseau; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, introduced a bill (S. 1893) for increase of pension of E. M. Wyman, widow of Robert Harris Wyman, late a rear-admiral in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1894) to amend an act entitled "An act to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon," approved January 31, 1885; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1895) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to create a commission to try and to dispose of claims for citizenship in the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Chickasaw, and Seminole Indian Nations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1896) to regulate the practice in adjusting claims in the Pension Office and proceedings in cases of appeal in pension claims from decisions of the Commissioner of Pensions to the Secretary of the Interior; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1897) granting a pension to Alexander Trimble; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1898) granting to the city of Marquette, Mich., certain lands for a public park; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Jacob Fritz, of The Dalles, Oreg., be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

RAILROADS IN CHARGE OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. CALL. Yesterday the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely the bill (S. 870) to provide that where any railroad property is taken into the possession of any United States court, and such railroad shall not have been completed, the net earnings of said railroad shall be applied to the completion of the same, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered and the bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee. The Chair hears no objection.

PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 545.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to suggest that three or four weeks ago there was a little bill that was up and partly considered in the morning hour, and it would not take more than five or ten minutes to dispose of it. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will give way.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust the pension bill will only take a few minutes. There is nothing further to do about it, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment at the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], which I send to the desk to be read. The amendment is to come in at the end of section 2 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to add:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to apply to the adjutant-general of a State or any other agent of a State authorized by the laws thereof to serve free of charge as the pension agent of the soldiers or ex-soldiers of said State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am informed by the Senator from Connecticut, at whose request I present the amendment, that in Connecticut and in several other States of the Union the adjutant-general of the State is by law required to give attention free of charge to all pension cases arising within the State. Section 2, if it shall pass without this proviso, would seem to prevent the operation of such State laws and this gratuitous action on the part of the adjutant-general. I therefore hope that the proviso will be added to the section.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. MILLER. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. MANDERSON.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be put on concurring in the amendments. The Chair supposes that will present the question the Senator from Kansas wishes.

Mr. INGALLS. That will present the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on concurring in the amendments and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. How many amendments are there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Three.

Mr. HALE. Can the vote be taken on all at once?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can by general consent, or any Senator may ask for a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the amendments read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that there are two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are three amendments.

Mr. INGALLS. One reported by the committee and two offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One reported by the committee, one offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], and one by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. INGALLS. Let them be read.

Mr. HALE. Let us first have the amendments read that came from the committee with its sanction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment will be first read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions and agreed to as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "month," to strike out:

And nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of sixteen years.

And to insert:

And in addition thereto the pension of widows shall be increased at the rate of $4 per month for each child under the age of eighteen years, of the husband on account of whose death the claim has been or shall be granted, which shall be in lieu of the rate of $2 per month allowed by existing law for children under the age of sixteen years; and when such child or children shall, under section 4703 of the Revised Statutes, receive less than $4 per month, such child or children shall, in addition, be paid so as to make such pension $4 per month.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let us have the other amendments read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read.

The SECRETARY. The second amendment is, after the word "month," in line 20, to add:

And in case said minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless, that the said pension shall continue and be paid during the existence of either of said disabilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The remaining amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 add the following proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to apply to the adjutant-general of a State or any other agent of a State authorized by the laws thereof to serve free of charge as the pension agent of the soldiers or ex-soldiers of said State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in these amendments, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the amendments are concurred in, will it be in order then to add to them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will still be open to amendment. It would not be in order to strike out parts of the amendments already adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. But the bill will still be open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be open to amendment. The Secretary will call the roll on the question of concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is at his room sick, and he instructed me to say that if he were present he would vote against these amendments.

Mr. DOLPH (after having voted in the affirmative). It slipped my mind for the moment that I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. Therefore I ask leave to withdraw my vote. I do not know how the Senator from Maryland would vote on the pending question.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is still detained from the Senate by illness. He is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and the Senator from Kansas not being present I do not know how they would vote.

Mr. PIKE. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Blair,	Frye,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Call,	Gray,	Palmer,	Teller,
Conger,	Harrison,	Sawyer,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Logan,	Sewell,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	McMillan,	Sherman,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Cameron,	Hampton,	Payne,
Berry,	Chace,	Harris,	Pugh,
Blackburn,	Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Vance,
Brown,	Coke,	Jackson,	Walthall,
Butler,	Gibson,	Jones of Arkansas,	Wilson of Md.

ABSENT—31.

Beck,	George,	McPherson,	Platt,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Camden,	Hale,	Maxey,	Ransom,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Miller,	Riddleberger,
Dolph,	Hoar,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sabin,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Vest.
Fair,	Kenna,	Pike,

So the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. INGALLS. I voted against the amendments, not because I was opposed to the principle, but because I did not desire to delay action upon the bill as it came from the House. The bill having been amended, the objection of course is now avoided; the bill is to return to the House and further amendments are germane and appropriate. I, therefore, move to amend the bill by inserting what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following additional section:

SEC. —. That section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, chapter 187, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes," be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That all pensions which have been or which may hereafter be granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, if the disability occurred prior to discharge, and if such disability occurred after the discharge, then from the date of actual disability, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension; and in the consideration of any and all claims for pensions in consequence of death from or for disability resulting from disease contracted in the service during the late civil war, the person on whose account the said pension is claimed shall be conclusively presumed to have been sound and free from disease at the date of entering the service."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have a word to say on that amendment. I was very anxious when the bill came from the House, and so stated, that it should be taken up and passed as the House passed it. The Senator having it in charge, however, was desirous to have certain amendments made to it for the betterment of the bill; I presume that was his intention; and he persisted in offering them against the protest of quite a number of Senators who were very anxious for the bill to pass as it came from the House.

I find no fault whatever with that, sir; but if one amendment can be agreed to by the other House another amendment which is right should be added; and if any amendment that has been offered to the bill is of itself entirely consistent with the idea of pensions and correct in every proposition, it is the amendment offered now by the Senator from Kansas. Why? It proposes that pensions shall commence from the date of the discharge where the disability occurred prior to the discharge, and where the disability occurred subsequent to the discharge, then that the pension shall commence at the date of the disability.

I desire to ask but one question. Why should not a pension commence at the date of the disability? What does a law granting a pension mean? It means that a pension shall be granted for a disability. At what time shall it be granted? The man is entitled to the pension the very day the disability occurs, and why? Because of the disability. If he is entitled to the pension because of the disability then he is entitled to it from the commencement of the disability.

The only argument that can be made against this proposition is the amount of money it takes. There is no soundness in that argument, because if the party had applied for a pension when the disability occurred he then would have received the amount of money that he was entitled to under the law, which has since been only accumulating in the Treasury to his credit, if the Congress of the United States are willing to adopt the principle that ought to be applied to all pensions.

Will any one tell me that if a man loses his arm or his leg in battle he is not entitled to a pension the very moment he receives that wound? Under the law he is; and if he is entitled to that pension at the moment he receives that wound I should like to know why is he not entitled to the pension relating back to the time he received the wound? There is no reason, as I said, except the reason that it takes more money. That is no argument; it is the argument that a man would himself make against paying a debt because it had run so long that he thought it ought to be forgiven.

Now, is the Government going to say to men who are entitled to pensions, "You did not apply for your pension five years ago, and therefore you are not entitled to it?" Why are they not entitled to it? They are not entitled to it merely because Congress has passed an act providing that unless a pension is applied for at a certain time the amount of money due the party shall be retained in the Treasury of the United States; in other words, it is a statute of limitation on a man's leg. A man has lost a leg or an arm, and a statute of limitation is passed by Congress against that man's leg or arm that is gone; that is, that he shall not receive pay for it unless he applies at a certain time.

There are many reasons for applications not being made. What are they? Many men say, "I do not want a pension; I will not ask the Government for a pension." Why? "I can live without it." That is one reason. I could say—but I dislike to mention myself—that I was entitled to a pension early in the war and have been ever since, but I have never asked for it and never expect to; but if I was to ask for it I should take it for granted at least that I was entitled to a pension the day I received my wound, for it would be for the wound that the pension would be granted. I only refer to this as an illustration. Other gentlemen here are in the same position. Some men who have pensions have them because of their wounds. Why, then, if they have them because of their wounds, should the pension not commence at the time the wound was received or the disability was incurred? I should like to know.

I will say that no bill ever passed Congress that benefited the people of the United States more for the amount of money that was embraced in it than the arrearage-of-pensions act when it passed. It distributed the money among the people who were entitled to it and relieved their wants and necessities, and, in fact, as is well known, at that very time the general distribution of that sum was not only a benefit to those who were the recipients of the fund, but it was a general benefit to the country at the time. It increased the prosperity of the people. I would not throw money out of the Treasury merely for that purpose; I would not ask any one to do it on that account, but because I believe it is honest and just to those men who are entitled to pensions that the pension should commence with the commencement of the disability or injury at whatever time that may have been.

Now, sir, if a contract exists between the Government and the soldier, as does under a law enacted many years ago, what is it? There is an agreement between the Government and the soldier that if he enlists in a war the Government will pay him a pension for injuries that he may receive during the term of service, whether those injuries result from wounds or from disability occurring from other causes. This agreement was made, and is always made by the Government with the soldier, and is made now. Whether it is in the law or not, it is an implied agreement that exists between the man who serves the country and the country that he shall at least, if he is wounded or disabled, receive a pension of such character as Congress shall deem suited to the disability.

So, then, if this bill is to be amended at all, and inasmuch as it has been amended, believing this amendment more meritorious than any one which has been offered, I shall vote for it and hope it will pass.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Kansas explain how much money will be required to carry out this amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no idea how much money will be required. It will depend entirely on the number of applications which may be made.

The fact in regard to this matter is that the principle that is enunciated in this amendment has been applied to every pensioner whose application was filed prior to the 1st of July, 1880. This merely extends the application of that principle to those whose pensions may be granted in cases where the application has been filed since that date.

Mr. BUTLER. Has any estimate ever been made as to the cost?

Mr. INGALLS. There have been a great many estimates made, many of them wild and unfounded and based entirely on conjecture. The only positive factor in the problem is based upon the calculation of those whose applications have been filed already since 1880. How much would be expended in consequence of those that may be filed hereafter is, of course, an unknown quantity. However much the amount might be, the question does not appear to me to be pertinent to the subject, inasmuch as the only inquiry that could be made is whether or not the principle is just. If the obligation is an existing one, the question ought not to be how much it will cost to comply with it, but whether the condition is such that the application should be made at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. LOGAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Let the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. INGALLS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I find in the Revised Statutes of 1873 that section 4709 reads as follows:

SEC. 4709. All pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension; provided the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same. But the limitation herein prescribed shall not apply to claims by or in behalf of insane persons and children under sixteen years.

That, I believe, was enacted about 1868. I have not had time to refer to the original statute. I find that section 4717 reads as follows:

SEC. 4717. No claim for pension not prosecuted to successful issue within five years from the date of filing the same shall be admitted without record evidence from the War or Navy Department of the injury or the disease which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made: Provided, That in any case in which the limitation prescribed by this section bars the further prosecution of the claim, the claimant may present, through the Pension Office, to the Adjutant-General of the Army, or the Surgeon-General of the Navy, evidence that the disease or injury which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made, originated in the service and in the line of duty; and if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it may be submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proved to be made, and a copy of the same to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and the bar to the prosecution of the claim shall thereby be removed.

Section 4713 provides:

SEC. 4713. In all cases in which the cause of disability or death originated in the service prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, and an application for pension shall not have been filed within three years from the discharge or death of the person on whose account the claim is made, or within three years of the termination of a pension previously granted on account of the service and death of the same person, the pension shall commence from the date of filing by the party prosecuting the claim the last paper requisite to establish the same. But no claim allowed prior to the 6th day of June, 1866, shall be affected by anything herein contained.

Those provisions were in force for a long series of years, and I believe there is scarcely a class of claims of any character as to which there is not a limitation. Claims originating under the act of July 4, 1864, not presented prior to the 1st day of January, 1880, are barred, and they can not be prosecuted now. Claims for horses lost by soldiers in action during the war are also barred, and various others; and it seems that up to 1879 it was the uniform policy of the Government, the uniform policy of all parties in power up to that time, to have some limitation as to these matters.

I find another limitation in the statutes which works a very grave injury to many soldiers in Missouri. Section 4722 provides:

SEC. 4722. The provisions of this title are extended to the officers and privates of the Missouri State militia, and the provisional Missouri militia, disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty while such militia was co-operating with United States forces, and the widow or children of any such person, dying of injury received or disease contracted under circumstances herein set forth, shall be entitled to the benefits of this title. But the pensions on account of such militia shall not commence prior to the 3d day of March, 1873.

There is another section which bars all claims of the Missouri State militia not presented prior to the 1st day of July, 1874. I read from clause 3 of section 4693:

Third. Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians, disabled in consequence of wounds or injury received in the line of duty in such temporary service. But no claim of a State militiaman, or non-enlisted person, on account of disability from wounds, or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874.

Not only had the claims to be filed prior to that time, but to be prosecuted to a successful issue and granted; but there are a large number of very meritorious cases in Missouri which are now barred under that provision of the statute; and I can not vote for any extension or removal of the limitation which does not include also the Missouri militia.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer an amendment to the amendment, to come in after what has been already read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "service," at the end of the amendment of Mr. INGALLS, it is proposed to add:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

Mr. BUTLER. I have offered the amendment in perfect good faith. I think if we are to be just, we had better be just all around and extend that justice to the Mexican-war soldiers as well as to the soldiers of the late war, for whose pensions I have voted with great pleasure and shall so vote again. I have offered this amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. BUTLER. My amendment is an addition to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I ask that all be read together.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina be reported separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment last offered by the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The Secretary read Mr. BUTLER'S amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I fear that we are likely to reach a result similar to that which was arrived at in the last Congress with reference to the general question of pensions, by placing numerous amendments upon the bill which came from the House, sending it back there, and by delay losing all. I voted for the amendment reported by the Senate Committee on Pensions; I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas with reference to the extension of the limitation of arrearages; but in order to avoid the possible danger of losing the entire bill, I now wish to state that if the present amendments shall be voted down I will then move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was adopted with the hope that we may reach the bill just as it came from the House, and pass it without any amendment whatever, depending upon further action on the part of the Senate and House to provide for the subjects contained in the present proposed amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, and he will doubtless accept it, that it be inserted in his amendment "at the rate of $8 per month."

Mr. BUTLER. I accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina modifies his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the facts connected with it.

In the Forty-eighth Congress, when the Commissioner of Pensions was called upon to report what the extension of the arrears of pension act to January 1, 1885, would cost as applied to the number of cases then filed, the Commissioner reported to the Pension Committee that it would take $246,000,000 to extend the arrears-of-pension act up to the 1st of January, 1885. What it would take to extend it to all claims filed since or that may hereafter be filed, it is impossible to state. If such amendments are to be acted on accurately, or if they are adopted here, I shall move that the bill with all the amendments be recommitted to the committee, so that we may investigate and see what expenditure will be involved in the propositions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If it is in order, I will at this time make the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment reported to the bill by the committee, in order that we may avoid the necessity of taking votes on the pending amendments and determine the question at once. I hope therefore that that reconsideration may be had and that the Senate then will pass the bill just as it came from the House, and we can consider this other subject at some other time and in independent measures.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, which is not debatable.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I only want unanimous consent to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Nebraska speaking on the question of reconsideration, which under the rules is not debatable?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not intend to oppose any suggestions made by Senators in this matter. The committee have done what they considered their duty, and as a Senator believing as I do, I have done what I considered my duty—nothing factious, nothing political. If now the Senate think that all these amendments shall be withdrawn, I most cheerfully accede to it; but the amendments which have been placed on the bill by the Senate, if not retained there, never, never will find a place in the laws of this country. I am satisfied so far as the discussion has gone in both ends of the Capitol that no further or other increase of pensions will be made at this session of Congress than those which appear in this bill for the increase of the pensions of widows.

Indications in the House of Representatives show that no further or other increase will be allowed there.

I only asked one simple thing, that the minors shall be protected to this meager extent and to keep the idiotic and insane and helpless children of dead soldiers from spending their days in a poor-house. That was all. Feeling as I did that the only guarantee or bounty which we shall get must be obtained here and now, was the reason I have urged, probably too persistently, this matter upon the attention of the Senate. I have discharged my duty fully. I propose no opposition to the suggestion or motion of the Senator from Iowa. I know that my friends who feel as warmly as I do and whose suggestions have a right to more consideration than mine, have urged that this matter should not be pressed. They fancied they found in it a peril at the other end of the Capitol to the bill itself. I did not so conceive. I thought any antagonism that might come or any divergence of opinion could easily be arranged. If the House refused to accede, we could withdraw the amendments and have the bill passed pure and simple as it came from the House.

This is all I desire to say in explanation of my own action, and I must of course assent to the judgment of friends in the Senate. I have no desire outside of the wishes of the friends of the bill who feel as keenly and as warmly as I do for these propositions, and if they desire that this course shall be taken let it be done.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator who offered this amendment to the concluding paragraph as left in:

> And to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war.

That is entirely unnecessary, because if they were soldiers or sailors they would receive the pension anyhow. I suggest that the Senator strike that clause out. I think it would perfect his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall do so with great pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina modifies his amendment. It is not open to amendment otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire now to make another suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina, which I hope he will accept. I suggest the addition of this proviso:

> Provided, That this act shall not apply to any person who now remains under disabilities under the Constitution of the United States.

That has always been in every Mexican pension bill that has been passed.

Mr. BUTLER. I accept the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent of the Senate that his motion to reconsider be now put, not being in order at this time pending another question. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has not the Senator the right to make a motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, which the Chair will read, a motion to reconsider can be entered, but can not now be put pending another question. The Secretary will read the twenty-second rule.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XXII.

PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS.

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. BLAIR. I find there is a somewhat general disinclination to vote on these amendments until the question of reconsideration is determined. For my own part I want to vote on them all, but I feel under some obligation to defer to the wishes of so many of my friends, and I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to reconsider the vote adopting in the Senate the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill now stands as it came from the House.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. BUTLER. We will all go down together, and of course I withdraw mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks leave to withdraw the amendment offered by him. If there be no objection the amendment is withdrawn. The Senator from South Carolina also withdraws his amendment. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment proposed by the committee is not agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments are disagreed to. The bill stands just as it came from the House of Representatives. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. CONGER. Should not the title be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no amendment made to the bill requiring a change of the title.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. LOUIS ST. MARTIN, of Louisiana; Mr. A. B. IRION, of Louisiana; Mr. C. P. SNYDER, of West Virginia; Mr. W. W. ELLSBERRY, of Ohio; Mr. F. D. ELY, of Massachusetts; Mr. G. W. E. DORSEY, of Nebraska, and Mr. JOSEPH LYMAN, of Iowa, the committee on the part of the House to join a similar committee on the part of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of Hon. MICHAEL HAHN and to escort the remains of the deceased to the place of burial.

Tne message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

STEAMSHIP OZAMA.

Mr. FRYE. Order of Business 261, being the bill (H. R. 5219) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city, which was a steamer that was wrecked——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move its consideration?

Mr. FRYE. I am going to ask unanimous consent to consider it. It was a steamer that was a total wreck, was saved by Virginia salvors, and was repaired at an expense of $50,000. It does not come within the law, because the wreck was just outside the line. The bill has been reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce unanimously in both branches; it has passed the House, and is here. American mechanics and salvors have received $50,000 laid out on it. The steamer is ready for sea, and the expense of detaining her is very great, indeed. She can not sail until she gets this register. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be put on its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5219) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator whether the proper officer designated to issue the register should not be the Secretary of the Treasury instead of the Commissioner of Navigation?

Mr. FRYE. This is the bill which the Secretary of the Treasury sent, after an amendment had been made by himself, and it is approved by him, the same one reported to the Senate by our committee, and it has now come from the other House.

Mr. CONGER. I think the circumstances of this vessel would bring it within the spirit of the law which would authorize the Secretary hinself to issue an American register, except that the wreckage was beyond the marine league provided for in the present law. That being the situation of the vessel, much as I am opposed to the general registry of foreign vessels, I have joined in the report of this bill and think it ought to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the bill (S. 715) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation, situate in the State of Nebraska, of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOAR. I now move in pursuance of notice that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Presidential count bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

UMATILLA INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to give way for a few moments until Order of Business 134, being the bill (S. 1210) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make sale of certain lands of the Umatilla Indian reservation, in Oregon, to William S. Byers and others, and to issue patent therefor, is taken up and the consideration of it concluded. It was partly considered about three weeks since.

Mr. HOAR. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose, reserving my right if the bill takes any long debate to object to its continuance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts yielding, the Senator from Oregon asks for the consideration of the bill named by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs is still pending. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "heretofore" it is proposed to insert "lawfully;" so as to read:

Provided, That this act shall in no way impair or affect any existing right to a reasonable use of the water of said stream for agricultural purposes, nor shall confirm or grant any right to use the water thereof in any manner nor to any extent beyond or different from that to which it has been heretofore lawfully appropriated.

Mr. DOLPH. The amendment was moved under a misapprehension of the facts. It would destroy the entire purpose of the bill.

As was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], the ditch was constructed a mile in length, and a grist-mill was constructed at a cost of $100,000 under a license from the Interior Department, a license which is revocable. The present owners of the mill purchased the property supposing that it was a permanent right. Therefore if the word "lawfully" is inserted it will destroy the entire purpose of the bill, because the very object of this bill is to get a lawful right and a continuing right to the water. When they purchase the land of the Indians under the provisions of this bill it carries with it the right to the water which they must necessarily purchase. So this amendment ought not to be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. There are other amendments offered by the Senator from Vermont to which I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further amendments will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The next proposed amendment is, in line 20, after the word "the," to strike out the words "approval thereof by the;" and after the word "Secretary," in the same line, insert:

Being satisfied that such appraisal is just, and his approval thereof in writing.

After the word "them," in line 24, insert "within three months next after such approval;" so that the clause will read:

And thereupon, and upon the Secretary being satisfied that such appraisal is just, and his approval thereof in writing, it shall and may be lawful for him to make sale of the said lands, at their appraised value, to the said William S. Byers, Robert G. Thompson, and Jeremiah Barnhart; and upon payment by them, within three months next after such approval, in full of the purchase-price thereof, together with all costs and expenses incurred in the premises, the Secretary shall cause a patent to be issued to them for the lands purchased.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no objection to those.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was recommitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the suggestion of an amendment by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. That amendment has been in substance adopted by the committee after a careful comparison of views between that Senator and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who was the author of the bill, or at least was the author of the general scheme that the bill contains, and reported it in a former Congress. The committee have reported a substitute embodying the amendment, but have had the original bill and the amendment so reprinted that it will disclose to the Senate where the amendment departs from the original bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the substitute may be read and treated as an original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute proposed will be read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the electors of each State shall meet and give their votes on the second Monday in January next following their appointment, at such place in each State as the Legislature of such State shall direct.

SEC. 2. That if any State shall have provided, by laws enacted prior to the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, for its final determination of any controversy or contest concerning the appointment of all or any of the electors of such State, by judicial or other methods or procedures, and such determination shall have been made at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes as provided in the Constitution, and as hereinafter regulated, so far as the ascertainment of the electors appointed by such State is concerned.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the executive of each State, as soon as practicable after the conclusion of the appointment of electors in such State, by the final ascertainment under and in pursuance of the laws of such State providing for such ascertainment, to communicate, under the seal of the State, to the Secretary of State of the United States, a certificate of such ascertainment of the electors appointed, setting forth the names of such electors and the canvass or other ascertainment under the laws of such State of the number of votes given or cast for each person for whose appointment any and all votes have been given or cast; and it shall also thereupon be the duty of the executive of each State to deliver to the electors of such State, on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet, the same certificate, in triplicate, under the seal of the State; and such certificate shall be inclosed and transmitted by the electors with and at the same time and in the same manner as is provided by law for transmitting by such electors to the seat of Government the lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President; and section 136 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed; and if there shall have been any final determination in a State of controversy or contest as provided for in section 2 of this act, it shall be the duty of the executive of such State, as soon as practicable after such determination, to communicate, under the seal of the State, to the Secretary of State of the United States, a certificate of such determination, in form and manner as the same shall have been made; and the Secretary of State of the United States, as soon as practicable after the receipt at the State Department of each of the certificates hereinbefore directed to be transmitted to the Secretary of State, shall publish, in such public newspaper as he shall designate, such certificates in full; and at the first meeting of Congress thereafter he shall transmit to the two Houses of Congress copies in full of each and every such certificate so received theretofore at the State Department.

SEC. 4. That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors. The Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of 1 o'clock in the afternoon on that day, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules in this act provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative votes of both Houses. If more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, those votes, and those only, shall be counted which shall have been regularly given by the electors who are shown by the evidence mentioned in section 2 of this act to have been appointed, if the determination in said section provided for shall have been made, or by such successors or substitutes, in case of a vacancy in the board of electors so ascertained, as have been appointed to fill such vacancy in the mode provided by the laws of the State; but in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State tribunals determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 2 of this act, is the lawful tribunal of such State, the votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, of such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of the tribunal of such State so authorized by its laws; and in such case of more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State aforesaid, then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State. When the two Houses have voted they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the questions submitted. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

SEC. 5. That while the two Houses shall be in meeting as provided in this act the President of the Senate shall have power to preserve order; and no debate shall be allowed and no question shall be put by the presiding officer except to either House on a motion to withdraw.

SEC. 6. That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or other question arising in the matter, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question five minutes, and not more than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House to put the main question without further debate.

SEC. 7. That at such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: For the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, immediately upon his left; the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not provided for the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon each side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the count of electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any such votes, or otherwise under this act, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess of such House not beyond the next calendar day, Sunday excepted, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon. But if the counting of the electoral votes and the declaration of the result shall not have been completed before the fifth calendar day next after such first meeting of the two Houses, no further or other recess shall be taken by either House.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to propose one or two verbal amendments to this bill, which I suppose will be adopted as of course; they are merely to correct errors in the transcription. In line 16, section 3, I desire to strike out the words "with and." This does not change the meaning of the bill, and makes the English better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 16, section 3, after the word "electors," it is proposed to strike out the words "with and;" so as to read:

And such certificate shall be inclosed and transmitted by the electors at the same time and in the same manner as, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in the fiftieth line of section 4, I move to strike out the word "tribunals" and insert the word "authorities."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 50, section 4, after the word "State," it is proposed to strike out the word "tribunals" and insert "authorities;" so as to read:

But in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State authorities determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 2 of this act, is the lawful tribunal of such State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts explain the effect of the amendment substituting the word "authorities" for the word "tribunals."

Mr. HOAR. That substitution has been made all through the bill. This is a mere verbal substitution to correspond with the others. In all the previous parts of the bill that substitution has already been made. I will explain it in a moment, if the Senate will allow, when these verbal amendments have been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is considered as agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in line 56 of the same section, I move to strike out the words "of the tribunal."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 56 of section 4, after the word "decision," it is proposed to strike out the words "of the tribunal;" so as to read:

The votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, of such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of such State so authorized by its laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment is considered as agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it wants five minutes of the time when the unfinished business would under the rule be laid before the Senate; and, although I do not anticipate any considerable debate upon this bill as it now stands, I think I shall not ask the Senate to dispose of it in those five minutes, because it is important that every Senator who desires to offer any views upon the bill or listen to any should have that opportunity. I will, however, state——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] desires to present a question, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow his remarks to go over.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply want to present a resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will ask unanimous consent—and I will answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi to-morrow morning if the Senate gives it consent—that this bill may go over and may be taken up at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow morning, that it may stand to-morrow in the same place that it has now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the pending bill shall be taken up after the routine or regular business of the morning hour to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask consent to make a report from the Committee on Printing at this time, and I ask that the resolution reported be acted on at once. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, together with the views of the minority, upon the letter of the Attorney-General declining to transmit official records and papers concerning the administration of the office of district attorney, southern district of Alabama.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to amend that by adding "and the message of the President."

Mr. MANDERSON. That is part of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be reported.

Mr. MANDERSON. The committee does not recommend any amendment. It came to the committee in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be treated as an amendment. The following amendment is proposed——

Mr. MANDERSON. Then the committee will recommend its adoption.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the resolution "and the message of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I inquire whether the resolution provides for printing the views of the minority as well as the report of the majority?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is also included.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, passed June 3, 1864.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond; and

A bill (S. 178) for the relief of Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson and Caroline Augusta Urquhart.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Illinois to allow me to occupy a few minutes in relation to a matter introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] in his speech on Friday.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, when the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] was on the floor talking on the subject which is now brought to the attention of the Senate again he read a letter that was signed by me as chairman of the Committee on Finance. If it only related to myself I should not take any notice of it, but in justice to the committee I feel bound to call attention to it, because the Senator represented that that letter was the beginning of the controversy with the present administration in relation to the submission of papers in regard to suspended officers.

Mr. President, it will be noted that the letter as printed read as follows:

COMMITTEE OF FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 5, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the accompanying nomination of—

Leaving off the names—

suspended, will you please communicate to the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, the reasons for such suspension, or the papers on file in your Department which show the reasons for this suspension?

Very truly, yours,

JUSTIN S. MORRILL, Chairman.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

When we arrived here early in December last it was promulgated that this administration, and especially the Treasury Department, was to be administered on business principles, and, therefore, the Committee on Finance pursued their usual routine of business and sent a letter, as they had long been in the habit of doing, to the Secretary of the Treasury in identically the same terms as this one which was read by the Senator from West Virginia in relation to the suspension of a collector of an internal-revenue district—it is no matter where—and we received from the Department of the Treasury the following response:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, making inquiry as to the reasons for the suspension of—

from the office of collector of internal revenue for the twenty-first district of ——, and asking that any papers in reference thereto be forwarded to the Finance Committee of the Senate.

I have to say, in reply, that Mr. —— was appointed collector of internal revenue for the district named on the 29th day of July, 1882. During the recess of the Senate the President, and this Department, became satisfied that Mr. —— was not discharging the duties of his office efficiently, or in accordance with proper business methods.

As evidence of his unfitness a letter written by him to the Private Secretary of the President, without previous communication of any kind, is hereto annexed.

There are no other reasons for such suspension in any papers on file in this Department.

Yours, respectfully,

DANIEL MANNING.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

That was a letter giving abundant and satisfactory reasons for the suspension of this man, and there were also other papers sent and received, and I wish to say that the papers in support of the reasons given by the Secretary were so satisfactory to the Committee on Finance that it was unanimously reported—I believe I am trespassing. I say, then, that this person seemed to have as high a confidence in his ability in the position of an internal-revenue collector as Sancho Panza had in his ability to discharge the duties of governor of a certain island and he was about the same kind of politician, with equal qualifications, as I should judge.

It would seem that here was an example set that we might very well be allowed to follow and did follow; and it is the same policy we have pursued ever since I have been a member of the Committee on Finance, and we have never had a refusal until recently of full and satisfactory replies to any application to the Treasury Department for papers or information.

Mr. President, there is this one important consideration. When a man is proposed for an office it has always been the practice of the Committee on Finance, if there were any charges made against his character, official or personal, to give his friends and the person himself an opportunity of making a proper defense. We have even at this session gone so far in two instances as to permit the parties themselves to appear before the Committee on Finance to make any explanation of the charges or any argument in their defense that to them might seem proper.

Let me say that it would seem to appear as justice and equity to all parties that the parties who are about to quit office, to be turned out, if they are worthy of it, should go with as clean a bill of health as the parties that are to succeed them. That is the only point in the controversy so far as the Committee on Finance have made it; that is to say, if there were charges or reasonable grounds of suspicion that there were any charges against any parties suspended, they had a right to know it, or they had a right to know it if their record was a clean and correct one. The reputation of a man going out of office is as precious as that of the man coming in.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask a question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to know whether or not this Sancho Panza collector that you turned out appeared in response to the charges—the one to whom that letter referred?

Mr. MORRILL. The letter over his own signature was a sufficient indication of what the qualifications and character of the man was. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Do I understand the Senator then to say that no opportunity was given to that man to appear and defend his character?

Mr. MORRILL. He could not defend his illiteracy and he could not defend some other points, and did not ask it, which it is unnecessary to mention.

Mr. GEORGE. He was turned out then because he was illiterate, was he?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not say that. I wish to show that the Secretary of the Treasury ever since the law organizing the Department was established was subject to the following statute law by which the Department itself was organized, passed in 1789. I do not read the first part of it but I read the latter part:

To execute such services relative to the sale of the lands belonging to the United States as may be by law required of him; to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and generally to perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform.

By this it is perfectly clear that we have a right to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to come before a committee of this body or to bring papers. The present presiding officer of this body when he was Secretary of the Treasury was called before the Committee on Finance, brought papers, and was subjected to two or three hours of examination, and gave us valuable information. No one will accuse that distinguished gentleman with not knowing his rights or with lowering the dignity of his office by so appearing and obeying the summons of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, there is only one thing in relation to this matter that we do not insist upon, which is that the Department shall give reasons for removals, because that might be imposing too large an amount of labor and difficulty, but we have insisted that we should have such papers as were necessary for our action here in disposing of the cases that we have before us.

THE ISSUE AS TO DUSKIN.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the basis of the discussion which has been going on in the Senate for several days is a resolution directing the Attorney-General to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, and the answer of the Attorney-General declining to transmit any papers relating to the suspension from office of Duskin, the former incumbent of that office, who was suspended during vacation.

The refusal of the Attorney-General to furnish the papers called for in this case is a denial of the right of the Senate, whose duty it is to legislate concerning the administration of public affairs, to inquire into the management of a public office at any time it may deem proper; and the excuse offered for this refusal is the fact that during the period of time covered by the resolution the incumbent of the office was suspended and another person designated to perform his duties.

The majority of the Senate maintain its right to pass such a resolution and that it is the duty of the Attorney-General under the law to obey it, while the minority of the Senate come to the support of the President and the Attorney-General and deny that it is the duty of the latter to obey the resolution.

It is assumed by the minority that the purpose of the Senate in passing the resolution was to inquire into the suspension of Duskin, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] disposes of the subject by saying that we are discussing a purely abstract proposition, that Duskin was suspended and Burnett appointed on the recommendation of the delegation in Congress from Alabama, and that Duskin did not complain. Let us see what Duskin himself says on that subject. I find the following letter in a recent issue of the New York Tribune:

To the Editor of The Tribune:

SIR: I had not intended to say anything in relation to my suspension from the office of United States attorney of the southern district of Alabama until the Attorney-General or the President had given some reasons therefor; but as the minority of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate have seen proper in their report upon the resolutions offered by Senator EDMUNDS concerning the office of district attorney for the southern district of Alabama to say that "Duskin has made no complaint to the Judiciary Committee, the President, or the Attorney-General that he was wronged by suspension," and that "the committee was fully informed that Burnett was recommended to the President by all the members of Congress from Alabama on personal knowledge of his high character," thereby seeming to intimate that I considered the President's action in suspending me just and proper, and that my character was not in the knowledge of the members of Congress from Alabama such as Mr. Burnett's, I ask leave in The Tribune merely to say that I did not complain to the Attorney-General or to the President, because I did not believe the President had been able to resist the importunities of Democratic politicians to have Republicans removed from office and their places filled by their own party friends, however sincere he might have been in his declaration that he would not remove an officer simply because he was a Republican; and that I had been removed because I was one, an offensive one perhaps, for I had dared to entertain and express my own political opinions on all proper occasions and to denounce publicly on the stump and in the United States court-room ballot-box stuffing and frauds at elections in the district. I did write to Senator EDMUNDS, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and ask him to give me an opportunity to refute any charges that might have been made against my personal character or against my integrity and efficiency as an officer. I had been up to the time of my suspension United States attorney for the southern district of Alabama for about twelve years, and there had never been a truthful charge made against me by any one that I had not faithfully performed the duties of the office; and no President, Attorney-General, or any other officer of the Government ever made a complaint against me during that time. The papers, letters, reports, and documents pertaining to the office during the terms I held it are on file in the Departments at Washington, and will clearly show how faithfully, honestly, and economically I discharged my duties; and I confidently challenge a comparison of them for any given time with those placed there by my successor. And as to my good character as a man, I am willing to leave that to the honorable Senator from Alabama who presented the minority report to the Senate, to whom I am personally known.

GEORGE M. DUSKIN.

MOBILE, ALA., March 6, 1886.

These, sir, are the reasons given by Mr. Duskin himself why he had made no noise about the action of the President. But it appears that he appealed to the Judiciary Committee, or its chairman, for a hearing. Whether the fact that Duskin had made speeches against ballot-box stuffing was any part of the reason for such a unanimous request from the Alabama delegation for his suspension and Burnett's appointment I am unable to say. The Senator says this Senate is thrown into a moot court to discuss abstract propositions, as Duskin's term expired four weeks before we called for the papers. Sir, it is not a moot proceeding when we are seeking to find out whether an American citizen has been unjustly treated by having false charges, slanderous statements, and secret assaults made against him and filed in the Department to which he was formerly attached to blacken his character and injure his good name.

The Senator also says that the Attorney-General, in refusing the papers to the Senate, acted under orders from the President, and seems to think a disobedience of Presidential orders by the Attorney-General would be a great calamity, as it would disturb the confidential relations between the President and his Cabinet, and might result in the loss of his office. I can imagine a greater calamity to this country than that a Cabinet officer should lose his office. But the law should be obeyed, whether such a disaster is averted or not. The Attorney-General is an officer of the law. He holds an office created by law. Its duties are defined by law; and it is his duty to obey the law, whether it costs him his office or not.

THE PRACTICE OF CALLING FOR PAPERS.

Again, the Senator says in his minority report that during eighty years, from 1789 to 1867, there can not be found a single case like the one we are discussing. Well, sir, the truth is, as stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in his report and remarks, that there can be found very few instances where information has been called for of any kind in which it has not been furnished. It may be that there can not be found a case where the facts are all exactly like this one. Neither are there any two things in all nature exactly alike, but there are nevertheless hundreds that are substantially alike. So in this matter. There are many cases alike in principle, if not in all the facts. The prominent fact is that when either branch of Congress has called for any information it has generally been furnished, and in the exceptional cases in which it was not the refusal was not based on constitutional prerogative. Some Presidents have asserted their independence as a co-ordinate branch of the Government and then furnished the information sought by either branch of the law-making power.

The Senator from Alabama finally lands the defense of the conduct of the administration in refusing the papers in the Duskin case on the broad platform that the power of removal is in the President alone, and that any law which attempts to interfere with its free exercise is unconstitutional. But when the President suspended Duskin he did it under the tenure-of-office act. So the case stands, that the President proposes to obey the law in getting men out of office, and then denies its constitutionality when the Senate says to him that under that law we have a right to inquire into his act of suspension, and to do that intelligently we need all the papers on file. The President uses the law in suspending men from office, and then in a volunteer message to the Senate he questions the constitutionality of that law and intimates that we are attempting to interfere with his high and mighty prerogative as the chief executive officer. Verily, consistency is not a jewel conspicuously worn in these days of Jeffersonian simplicity.

Now, Mr. President, let us consider the argument of the Senator from Alabama in relation to the letter read by the Senator from Vermont from Mr. Thurman, who formerly occupied a seat on this floor and who has been represented, and I think truly, as the greatest Democrat on American soil—a letter in which Mr. Thurman as chairman of the Judiciary Committee called for certain papers. The Senator from Alabama says that Mr. Thurman was calling for papers or information in relation to the removal of Shaeffer as chief-justice of Utah, and that that office did not come under the provisions of the tenure-of-office act, as judges were excepted from the terms of that law. The Senator therefore assumes that there is nothing in that case pertinent to this discussion. Let us see. I believe that Territorial judges do come under the provisions of that law, and the language of the letter indicates that Mr. Thurman and the committee believed so too. Mr. Thurman's letter reads:

APRIL 7, 1879.

SIR: Under the direction of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, I have the honor to request that you will communicate to the committee any papers or information in your possession touching the question of the propriety of the removal of Michael Shaeffer, chief-justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah, and the appointment of David T. Corbin to that office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. THURMAN, Chairman.

The Hon. ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES.

Is there anything in that letter to indicate that Mr. Thurman believed that the office of a Territorial judge was not covered by the tenure-of-office act? The letter plainly shows that Mr. Thurman and the committee desired to know whether President Hayes had not done Judge Shaeffer and the public service a wrong in suspending him, and that they wanted to see the papers lest they and the Senate might do either Judge Shaeffer or the country an injustice.

I desire to say here a little outside of the record that I believed then and I believe now that the President of the United States did do Judge Shaeffer a wrong in suspending him from that office, because I believed then and I believe now that he was doing his whole duty as chief-justice of that Territory.

But suppose the Senator is right in saying that the Territorial judges are excepted from the law. If he is, he takes issue with the present Executive, who has suspended a number of them under the authority of that law.

I assert again that the Senator from Alabama if he undertakes to defend Mr. Thurman in his calling for the information in that case puts it under the Constitution alone without the law, and then the Senator from Alabama says that under the Constitution the President of the United States has the right to make removals, and it is none of the Senate's business or anybody else's business except the people's. So in either event, whether he refers to it under the law, or outside of the law under the Constitution, I say that the position of the Senator from Alabama is entirely indefensible. If the Senator is right, he is defending Mr. Thurman in doing what he asserts most positively he had no right to do. If the Senator is right, Mr. Thurman was attempting to interfere with the Chief Executive in the exercise of what we are told is his absolute power of removal under the Constitution by asking for the papers in the case of an officer who was not suspended under the tenure-of-office act, but under the Constitution. No matter which alternative is accepted, the defense of the President and the Attorney-General for their course in the particular case before us is gauzy and will not hold together.

WHAT ARE OFFICIAL PAPERS.

The honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has criticised the definition given by the honorable Senator from Vermont of a public paper, and in doing so has gone beyond the bound of reason, far into the domain of the absurd.

The importance or relevance of papers must be judged by their substance.

The hypothetical letters from "a vile man," suggested by the vivid imagination of the Senator from West Virginia, coming, as he says, from "a vile man," his vileness evidenced by their substance and their irrelevancy to any public question apparent to all, would of course be admitted to have no place on the public files; no matter what form of address had been used, such letters would properly and unhesitatingly be destroyed by their recipient. It would be unnecessary to seek any legal warrant for their destruction. The simple law of common sense would justify it, and no one knows that better than the Senator himself.

Now, the Senator has given free rein to his imagination and the result has been some hypothetical letters altogether improbable. On the question whether they were in good taste I will say nothing.

Following the idea suggested by the honorable Senator, I will describe a possible, in fact I think a very probable, communication to a public official, and inquire whether it would be a public or private paper.

Let me ask that it be supposed that A, who is a Republican, holds a Government office in some town, and that B, who is a Democrat, wants it. Such a state of things can be easily imagined, I am sure. The picture is so simple, so lifelike, that surely all will recognize it as something they have lately seen.

B therefore is out and wants to get in. He draws up a paper in which he charges all sorts of offenses against A—misconduct in office, "offensive partisanship," anything, so it is a charge. This paper is couched in legal phrases perhaps; it bears all the semblance of an information or a true bill of indictment. B signs it, perhaps makes oath to it; others who are friends to B join him in the charges.

The document is completed and duly forwarded to the President of the United States, and by him duly filed in the proper Department. Along with it, perhaps, or following close on its heels, is B's application, which is also duly filed, probably in the same box or pigeon-hole.

I emphasize the word "filed," for it may be shown to be an important word in this discussion. Assume for the moment that the President is right in holding that papers addressed to him concerning appointments or removals are not necessarily public papers. Assume, if you please, that he might read them and at once destroy them. They had perhaps (I only say perhaps) not fully reached the point at which they became public papers. But, sir, after he has read them and forwarded them to the Department to which they relate, and the file mark of that Department has been stamped upon them, they cease to be, if they ever were, private papers. I hold in my hands some letters from the public files of one of the Departments. They were furnished on the call of the Committee on Territories. I will indicate something of their character and read the file-mark which appears upon each individual letter.

These letters were in response to that committee before the discovery was made that all these vast amounts of documents or papers that get into the public files are private. What are the facts in reference to them, as the records of the Departments show? Here is one [exhibiting] stamped "Department of the Interior, appointment division, received 29th of August, 1885; Tombstone, Arizona, August 3, 1885." And so every single document in this package [exhibiting], which has been forwarded by A, B, and C, all over the country, in favor of the appointment of a given individual therein named, has the stamp of the Department on it. When these papers were put in the Department that stamp was put upon them; and I say if they ever were private papers, after that they became public papers beyond any possible question.

I will not stop to read the statute in reference to abstracting papers from the files, as it is claimed that this administration has the right to do. The theory is that all this mass of documentary evidence which has come into the possession of the different Departments of the Government, through the hands of the President perhaps, is his personal property and that he has a right to read it and destroy it or do what else he pleases with it. I say not. Papers once so filed become public property and are protected by the statute, sections 5403 and 5408.

SEC. 5403. Every person who willfully destroys or attempts to destroy, or, with intent to steal or destroy, takes and carries away any record, paper, or proceeding of a court of justice, filed or deposited with any clerk or officer of such court, or any paper, or document, or record filed or deposited in any public office, or with any judicial or public officer, shall, without reference to the value of the record, paper, document, or proceeding so taken, pay a fine of not more than $2,000 or suffer imprisonment, at hard labor, not more than three years, or both.

SEC. 5408. Every officer, having the custody of any record, document, paper or proceeding specified in section 5403, who fraudulently takes away, or withdraws, or destroys any such record, document, paper, or proceeding filed in his office or deposited with him or in his custody, shall pay a fine of not more than $2,000, or suffer imprisonment at hard labor not more than three years, or both; and shall, moreover, forfeit his office and be forever afterward disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States.

Were the doctrine to obtain that these papers continue to remain the private property of whomever addressed to, where would it lead? Would any one assert that ex-President Hayes or ex-President Arthur—the only two living ex-Presidents I believe that we have—could now go into the Departments and withdraw and destroy all such letters written to them while they held office, because they were only placed there for their convenience? Surely not, and I am unwilling to believe that the President of the United States or anybody connected with him believes any such thing.

But to return to the subject of B's effort to get A's office, and the paper he files to effect his object:

Acting upon the charges thus presented the President suspends A and designates—note the word designates—B to fill the office temporarily. Will the Senator from Alabama contend that such a document so filed is private, and that it is not in the province of the Senate to call for it when considering the propriety of confirming B in said office and thereby making A's removal complete?

B may be a perjurer, or may have deceived the President by statements utterly false, the evidence of which is to be found only in the papers filed by him.

The fear that such things may be prompted the call for papers, the refusal of which has resulted in the present controversy. If the President has truly said that he suspends no officers except for good cause, some such papers must have been filed. Indeed such documents have been invited by the present administration, as evidenced by a letter written by the present Postmaster-General, which I beg to read:

"OFFENSIVE PARTISANSHIP"—CELEBRATED CIRCULAR OF THE P. M. G.

[Confidential.]

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, April 29, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The continued illness of Mr. Hay will delay his coming for some time yet to the Department, and I think it desirable that some action should be taken in the way of removals, and am impatient to assist our people in securing relief, to which they are justly entitled, from partisan postmasters.

I have had a conference with the Virginia delegation, and they will soon bring in their cases, and I shall hope to make the earliest removals in that State. As soon as they shall be ready, and I hope within a week, I desire to appoint from three to ten in a county in Virginia, and amounting to several hundred altogether.

I had intended to write yourself and the Democratic delegation from Ohio to meet me this week and consider the plan upon which we should proceed in making removals in Ohio, but I understand it will be inconvenient for some of them to travel hither now, and it has occurred to me that perhaps the same end might be accomplished by writing.

I shall beg you, therefore, to consider the suggestions I make as to the methods of procedure, and if you can adopt them and get some cases ready within the next two or three weeks, I think within the month of May I can give substantial relief that will take away the importunity and discontent.

I think that from 15 to 20 per cent. of the fourth-class postmasters in Ohio might be removed within the next two months and great good accomplished thereby, if our people will adhere to a proposed plan.

That is, in fact, to pick out the most obnoxious and offensive partisans in each county to the number of a sixth to a quarter of all, and choose first-class men to take their places. I will require no more proof of partisanship in these selections than the affirmation of knowledge on the part of a Representative or Senator that the postmaster has been an active editor or proprietor of a Republican newspaper, printing offensive articles, easily shown by the slips, or a stump speaker, or a member of a political committee, or officer of a campaign club, or organizer of political meetings, or that his office has been made the headquarters of political work, or that his clerks have been put into the performance of political duties. Possibly other acts of equal force may be noted in some cases.

If the Representative does not know the fact, it should be established by some affidavit of some person whom he can affirm to be of unquestioned credibility or by some documentary evidence.

In recommending for appointment, I beg the Representative will state the age, business, and what kind of business experience, and a description of the business character of the applicant, and also his habits and standing in the community, and where there are various candidates, I shall be obliged by any explanations the Representative can give. This necessarily imposes a little trouble, and yet not very great, but it seems to me reasonable to require very extraordinary care and trouble to be taken to represent surely the facts.

The earliest removals and appointments of this kind will challenge the keenest scrutiny. The former must be justifiable, and the latter beyond criticism. Some mistakes have perhaps occurred, and our adversaries are keenly interested to make the most of every fault, because they have perceived a strong current of general disapprobation of the purposes of the administration.

In rendering this justice to our people, which consists of the removal of enemies and substitution of our friends, I feel that it is very desirable to proceed with extreme care, and that I am correctly representing the President's wishes and purposes in earnestly soliciting that every step may be taken accordingly. I may add that as the common good is infinitely beyond the welfare of any one person, however great his place, so appointments to further a mere personal end should be absolutely forbidden, and recommendations upon that basis may well expect disfavor.

I shall very willingly take up the case of any district or of any county, whenever they are ready; and I shall be glad if the Representative can personally attend and go over them. Papers should be sent in as soon as possible, and will be then carefully briefed in the Department; and when so made ready appointments can be made with great rapidity.

Should you think it desirable to have a personal conference before this is begun, I shall be very glad to meet the delegation, but as I have felt it desirable to relieve them of unnecessary journeying and expense, I have written a similar letter to each Representative from Ohio, and respectfully solicited responsive action in accordance with the spirit of it.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM F. VILAS,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That must be an official document. It is signed officially.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Vermont suggests that this must be an official document, as it is so signed; but it seems to have been regarded as "confidential" at the time it was issued.

I desire to notice this letter a little more particularly. At the very outset of the letter the Postmaster-General says that the continued illness of the First Assistant, who has since passed away, delays action by the Department, and he continues:

I think it desirable that some action should be taken in the way of removals, and am impatient to assist our people in securing relief, to which they are justly entitled, from partisan postmasters.

The people of this country were not moving fast enough for this administration. They were not getting ready for removals as fast as this reform administration thought they ought, and hence, as the mouthpiece of the administration, having announced their determination in the beginning of the administration to let everybody alone who was doing his duty, and as the people took them somewhat at their word, the Postmaster-General finally says he is impatient to get relief to his friends from the political enemies who are holding these offices, and he thereby invites the public to come to the relief of the administration and make cases for the removal of "partisan postmasters," as he saw proper to term them. Again he says:

As soon as they shall be ready, and I hope within a week, I desire to appoint from three to ten in a county in Virginia, and amounting to several hundred altogether.

There was an election coming on in Virginia, and the Postmaster-General, this reform officer, invites the people to come to the rescue, and tells them when they do get ready he will be able to appoint at least from three to ten in a county, and will get rid of several hundred in a little while! Again he says:

I shall beg you, therefore, to consider the suggestions I make as to the methods of procedure, and if you can adopt them and get some cases ready within the next two or three weeks, I think within the month of May I can give substantial relief that will take away the importunity and discontent.

By this time the people had begun to apply for themselves, and he thought if they would help that in a week he would take away some of the importunity that was pressing upon him for changes.

Let us go a little further:

That is, in fact, to pick out the most obnoxious and offensive partisans in each county to the number of a sixth to a quarter of all, and choose first-class men to take their places. I will require no more proof of partisanship in these selections than the affirmation of knowledge on the part of a Representative or Senator that the postmaster has been an active editor or proprietor of a Republican newspaper, printing offensive articles, easily shown by the slips, or a stump speaker.

He not only is anxious to go at this work, but he tells the people of the country how to make cases, and that they must hunt for the newspaper-men and the active editors or proprietors of Republican newspapers, and if they can be shown to be offensive by slips from the papers, or if they have been making speeches—

Or a member of a political committee or officer of a campaign club, or organizers of political meetings, or that his office has been made the headquarters of political work, or that his clerks have been put into the performance of political duties.

All these things he enumerates, which I think take in about everybody who is of any account, so that the people may understand how to go to work to make up charges against men who are in office, and he may give relief to the friends of the party. But lest none of those allegations in the indictments should be sufficient he adds another clause:

Possibly other acts of equal force may be noted in some cases.

I should think it probable that the honorable Postmaster-General had practiced law and that he had filed sometimes in the courts a declaration on a promissory note. All lawyers know that we generally put in one count declaring specifically upon the note, and for fear we may make a mistake we then put in the common count, so that we catch the man on the note and get a judgment anyway. So the Postmaster-General in this specific series of allegations that he makes, lest he has not made a full case, puts in the common count, so that anybody can be removed under it if persons see proper to make charges against him. Now, let us go a little further:

If the Representative does not know the fact, it should be established by some affidavit of some person whom he can affirm to be of unquestioned credibility, or by some documentary evidence.

There is the very foundation. He invites the people of this country, if they want a man turned out of office and have not the information themselves, to get somebody to file documentary evidence against him so that he may be able to make a case and turn him out. That is the kind of evidence that we are after to-day. We want the heads of these Departments to produce that documentary evidence in the case of A, B, C, and the six hundred or seven hundred men who had been removed from offices which are Presidential, so that we may know and that the world may know whether the men had their characters maligned and slandered or not. Let us go a little further:

The earliest removals and appointments of this kind will challenge the keenest scrutiny.

The Postmaster-General knew that he was doing a thing which was not in harmony with the avowed ideas of civil-service reform of his chief; and hence he says that the early removals will be scrutinized carefully and closely, and the moving spirits must be careful to make strong cases against that class of men.

So I might take up the time of the Senate in singling out items in this letter of the Postmaster-General, showing that right there was the beginning of the hypocrisy, I may say, of this administration in going back upon what they had pledged to the country, and at the same time undertaking to defend what they were doing. The Postmaster-General not only writes this letter himself, but he indicates in it that he has written the letter by the consent and understanding of the President of the United States, because he refers to the President and says they must be careful to keep the record all right.

Now, sir, if such papers are on file, they have become public papers; they are pertinent to our inquiry as to the fitness of the men proposed for office; we are entitled to them, and the President ought in good faith and obedience to law to produce them. If there are no such papers on file, let him say so, and the country will then be able to judge of his assertions that he has redeemed every pledge he has made to the people.

ALLEGED PRECEDENTS AGAINST CALLS FOR PAPERS.

The Senator from West Virginia then proceeds to cite a few precedents for the refusal by the Presidents and heads of Departments to furnish papers or information called for by one or the other of the Houses of Congress. In his investigation he seems to have discovered very few instances in which information called for has been withheld. Now, sir, assuming that all these cases were directly or even approximately analogous to the present controversy, would they establish a rule as against the hundreds, and, for all I know, thousands of cases in which calls for papers and information on all conceivable subjects have been promptly complied with?

But let us see how far they have any analogy to the question now in controversy.

The Senator cites the case of the refusal by President Jackson to furnish the Senate with a copy of a paper that had been published in the newspapers, purporting to have been read by him to his Cabinet officers, "relating to the deposits of public money in the Treasury of the United States," &c. There is no evidence that such a paper, if it existed, was in the nature of an official communication to any one, or that it was ever placed upon the files of any Department, or that it was even in existence at the time it was called for. In fact, from the description we have of it in the Senator's speech, it was more in the nature of a memorandum of what he desired to say to his Cabinet, and I do not suppose any one would assert the right of Congress to call upon the President for a report of all conversations he may have had with the members of his Cabinet. We are not asking anything of that sort now.

The Senator then cites the case in 1842, when the Secretary of War refused the House of Representatives information which they asked concerning the cause of removal of one Sylvester from a clerkship in the War Department.

This refusal was discussed by a committee of the House of which Hon. Garrett Davis was chairman, in which the action of the Secretary of War was condemned and the right asserted of either House of Congress to any and all papers on file in any of the Departments.

The next instance cited was in 1844, when President Tyler declined to furnish the Senate with "a copy of any instructions which may have been given by the Executive to the American minister in England on the subject of the title to and occupation of the Territory of Oregon since March 4, 1841," &c. The President, in reply, said he deemed it inexpedient in the then state of the subject-matter to furnish the information.

These are about all the cases he finds where calls for papers or information were met by refusals.

The Senator then proceeds to call attention to a resolution once offered in the Senate, which does not seem to have been adopted, proposing to call on the President for information concerning charges preferred against persons who had been removed from office. Why the resolution was not adopted the Senator fails to state and I do not know; but whatever the cause, there is no argument in it that we can not properly call for the information we are now seeking to obtain from the Executive Department.

Without, therefore, discussing the question whether the information called for in the cases cited by the honorable Senator was properly or improperly withheld, as precedents they are not in point in the present controversy, and are, in my opinion, only resorted to to cover up the real issue and to confuse the public mind.

But the climax of the Senator's argument was reached when he produced some musty documents which he said he had nearly forgotten to have read, although I think he would have lost nothing had he quite forgotten them. These documents, he said, were found in the archives of the State Department, and he for some unknown reason concludes that they were penned by Daniel Webster. They bear no date, they are addressed to no one, and no one signs them. They may possibly have been deposited in the State Department by some overzealous supporter of the Presidential prerogative for the convenience of the present Executive, as we are told other papers are deposited, and the Senator may have been made the innocent agent through whom these documents are to be palmed off on the public as genuine blanks once prepared for use by the State Department. A fusilade of such blank cartridges as these can not affect the matters really at issue, but they may perhaps, in the lack of a better defense, serve a useful purpose by beclouding the questions under discussion. There is no evidence given to show that such letters were ever used by the State Department in its correspondence with the Senate, and consequently, even supposing them to have been all the Senator claims for them, they were discarded and never used, because they could not properly be employed.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE CONTROVERSY.

I desire to enter my protest against what seems to me to be a studied effort on the part of those responsible for the present controversy between the President and the Senate to divert attention from the questions really at issue. In the first place, I protest against the assumption that the Senate by any action it has taken has sought to provoke this controversy. On the contrary, I assert that it has been provoked, and needlessly provoked, solely by the President and his advisers, who must alone bear the responsibility for whatever delay in the public business has been or may be occasioned.

During the year that has elapsed since the present administration came into power, I know of no instance in which the Senate has in any respect whatsoever failed to treat the administration with proper and impartial consideration, and with even and exact justice. The majority of this Senate, though not in political accord with the President, have not sought to offer any factious opposition to his administration, whatever may have been our opinions concerning some of its remarkable performances during this brief but Utopian era of reform.

The Senate has gone even farther than this. It has not only not offered any factious opposition for partisan purposes, but has treated the present administration precisely as a Republican administration would have been treated. No action has been taken which would not have been taken under similar circumstances had a Republican occupied the executive chair. No new rules have been adopted and no methods of procedure have been invented for the purpose of embarrassing an Executive who happens to be of a different, although perhaps undefined, political faith.

The fairness of this Republican Senate toward the present administration is illustrated by its record in matters of legislation as well as in the confirmation of appointments. How was it, sir, on the question of the Presidential succession? During the last Congress, when the administration was in the hands of the Republican party and we supposed it would continue to be, the Republicans of the Senate favored the passage of a bill changing the line of the Presidential succession. This measure was passed by the Republican Senate, but failed in the Democratic House. There was no politics in the measure then. Congress adjourned, and in time the present administration came into power. In time the Vice-President passed away, and the existing law, which could not be changed without our consent, assured the succession, in case of the death of the Presieent, to whomever the majority of this Senate might be pleased to designate by election as President pro tempore.

This was the situation of affairs when the present Congress convened, and the continuance of the Democratic administration depended upon but a single life. Memorable and melancholy events in the history of the Presidential office emphasize the uncertainty of this tenure. There was now the question of party advantage to be considered in connection with the Presidential succession. What is the record of this Republican Senate under these unusual circumstances? The first bill proposed, considered, and passed by this body at the beginning of this session was the Presidential succession bill passed by the Senate in the last Congress. This measure secured to the present administration beyond peradventure the control of the Government for the full term of four years, and it is needless to say that it was now promptly passed by the Democratic House and promptly approved by the Democratic President.

By this action, which is unprecedented in the history of political legislation, this Republican Senate voluntarily transferred its undisputed title to the Presidential succession into the hands of the Democracy, and demonstrated beyond question its disposition and determination to rise above mere partisanship in the performance of its public duties and in its attitude toward the present administration.

It is shown by the recent report of the Judiciary Committee that the course pursued by that committee in regard to the nominations made by the present Executive has differed in no respect from that which has been followed without question or objection for many years, both during the time when the Senate was under Democratic control and when it was under Republican control. This statement is not controverted in the report of the minority of the committee, so far as I have been able to observe, and it may therefore be safely assumed that the Senate has been proceeding in regular order and according to custom in these cases.

I submit, therefore, that under these circumstances the Senate can not fairly be charged with having been influenced by partisan considerations in any action that we have taken in reference to the nominations now pending, or with having by our action provoked the present controversy.

Now, sir, what has given rise to the present controversy? This Senate found itself charged with the duty of considering whether it could or would approve of the action of the President in suspending nearly seven hundred civil officers and in naming an equal number of men to take their places. This was not a small or trifling task to engage in. It sought in good faith to procure the papers on file in the several Departments relating to certain suspensions and nominations for the purpose of intelligently and wisely performing its duty in each case before it. It followed a course of action which had been followed without objection for many years, as the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] stated just before I commenced to address the Senate; and he is one of the oldest Senators in service upon this floor. The committees having such cases under consideration had been in the habit of sending for and receiving whatever papers were on file relating to any given case. So well was this custom understood that for a time no objection was made, and the committees were not denied the papers for which they asked, by the Departments called upon; but suddenly the leaven of reform began to work and a halt was called. Then, and not till then, did the present controversy begin. Then, and not till then, did the administration discover that the papers filed in cases of suspensions were not official papers, that they were private papers which belonged to the President, and that the Senate had no right even to politely ask for them, first, because they were private; second, because they belonged to the President, who had the right to burn them if he saw fit; and, third, because the Senate had nothing to say about suspensions or about removals from office at any rate.

It remained for an Executive who had proclaimed that public office was a public trust, and who was supposed to be conducting the public business behind glass doors, to make these interesting discoveries.

This discovery by the President raises the question whether the President has, as is claimed, the absolute power of removal of all civil officers except the judges. This carries with it the question more directly at issue, whether the Senate has authority to inquire into the action of the Executive in making suspensions from office, and in making such inquiry to require the production by the Executive Departments of papers on their files.

POWER OF REMOVAL.

Upon the question of the power of removal from public office by the President the Constitution, as we all know, is silent. The power, however, has been assumed to exist in the Executive, and for many years it was exercised by the President unchecked by any law of Congress. But the question has been often raised and ably discussed. The advocates of Executive prerogative largely base their opinions upon the noted precedent of 1789, when the question was raised in the First Congress on the consideration of an act for the creation of a department of foreign affairs, at the head of which should be a secretary to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to be removable by the President. A motion to strike out the words "to be removable by the President" was made, and after discussion lost. This precedent is discussed in the somewhat famous report of the Morehead committee of the Senate in 1844, in which the reasons are assigned why the failure to strike out the words "removable by the President" should not be regarded as a precedent and followed as a proper construction of the constitutional power of the President on the subject. Attention is called in that report to the fact that Washington was then the President; that "he was the nation's first and most beloved citizen;" that "he had safely conducted the armies of his country through all the emergencies of the war of the Revolution to independence and peace;" and that "such was the universal confidence of his countrymen in his purity, patriotism, wisdom, and worth" that the representatives of the people in Congress did not hesitate to place in his hands any power that was not expressly prohibited by the terms of the Constitution.

The Morehead committee said:

> That such a precedent, established at a time and under circumstances like these, should be regarded as transient only and subject to be reconsidered by Congress whenever experience should demonstrate the necessity.

Resting upon the precedent of 1789 the power of removal or suspension was exercised without serious question during the first thirty or forty years of the existence of the Government, and the fact is that for five successive administrations the power of removal or suspension from office was seldom resorted to, and when resorted to was, with rare exceptions, exercised for just cause. During the time from Washington down to the beginning of Jackson's administration, according to the Morehead report, which I doubt not was correct, there were only one hundred and twelve removals made, and of course, such being the fact, there was nothing to awaken in Congress or the country an apprehension of danger arising from unchecked executive power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And all those the law expressly authorized.

Mr. CULLOM. And all those, as the Senator from Vermont says, were expressly authorized. With the accession of Jackson to the Presidency a new era commenced, and the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" had full sway. The question of regulating the exercise of executive power then began to be agitated, and became a more serious question on the public mind. In 1826, however, the question had been raised when Mr. Adams removed certain officers and a committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the patronage of the Executive. The committee reported in favor of regulating appointments by law. Its report asserted the power of Congress to legislate on the subject, and Mr. Randolph stated that it could not be answered.

In 1835 another committee was raised by the Senate to inquire into the extent of the executive patronage, and that committee, by Mr. Calhoun, submitted with its report two bills, one of which provided that the President should lay before Congress every four years the names of all defaulting officers and agents charged with the collection and disbursement of public money whose commissions should be vacated, and also made it the duty of the President in all cases of nominations to fill vacancies occasioned by removals from office to assign the reasons for which such officers had been removed. The bill requiring the President to assign reasons for removals was passed by the Senate by a large vote.

Mr. President, it has been difficult at any time in the nation's history to secure legislation having for its object a limitation of the exercise of executive power in the disposition of official patronage. For many years of the Government's history removals or changes in office were comparatively few, and hence the country did not become alarmed lest the scramble for place should interfere with the proper administration of public affairs. While the constitutional power of the Executive to remove and the power of the Senate in the matter of removals and appointments were occasionally discussed, yet no such condition of affairs as exists to-day existed before the days of Jackson, and in those earlier days the people naturally failed to take much interest in the question as compared with the feeling for the last few years upon the subject.

The first check put upon the action of the President by actual legislation in the direction of restraint was the tenure-of-office act of 1867. While no statute had previously been enacted to restrain the President in the appointment and removal of civil officers, yet I think the fair conclusion to be drawn from the debates of Congress and the expressions of men whose opinions are entitled to respect is that the power exists in Congress to legislate to regulate the executive authority in the matter of removals from office. Such power was believed in by Hamilton, than whom no greater man, in my judgment, ever lived in the American nation, and who did more to map out the organization of this Government than any other man who had anything to do with it. That view was supported by Fisher Ames, by Calhoun, by Benton, by Webster, by Clay, and, coming down to the days when the tenure-of-office act was under discussion, by such men as Carpenter, and I believe it is understood all over this country that an abler lawyer had scarcely ever existed in his time in this country, and by Sumner, and I think by the majority of the earlier statesmen, as I have said, whose opinions would be accepted by the American people. Such power was assumed and exercised by Congress in the enactment of the tenure-of-office act. That act, as amended in 1869, stands upon the statute-book to-day, and, in the absence of judicial construction to the contrary, must stand as valid and in full force. That law, section 1767 of the Revised Statutes, provides that—

> Every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment with the like consent and advice of a successor in his place.

Section 1768, a part of that law, gives the President the power during the recess of the Senate to suspend any civil officer (except judges of the courts of the United States), appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until the end of the next session of the Senate. On the adjournment of the Senate at its session following such suspension the suspension runs out and ceases to exist, and if no appointment of a successor has been made with the advice and consent of the Senate the office would revert to the original incumbent. I think no other view can be sustained. Mr. Trumbull, who was a Senator from Illinois at the time, was chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and chairman of the conference committee on the part of the Senate to adjust differences between the Senate and House on the bill to amend the tenure-of-office act. That conference in 1869 resulted in the passage of the law as it now stands, and in explaining its provisions as arranged by the conference committee Mr. Trumbull said in the Senate:

> The only change made is this: As the bill passed the Senate it required a positive affirmative vote on the part of the Senate disagreeing to the suspension before the old officer could go back. As the committee of conference report it, the officer would go back at the end of the session unless somebody else was confirmed in his place. The authority of the President to suspend extends to the end of the session and no further, and, of course, the old officer then takes possession of his office.

In his extraordinary message to this Senate on the 1st instant the President, referring to the tenure-of-office acts of 1867 and 1869, said:

> The constitutionality of these laws is by no means admitted. But why should the provisions of the repealed law (of 1867), which required specific cause for suspension, and a report to the Senate of "evidence and reasons," be now, in effect, applied to the present Executive instead of the law afterward passed (in 1869) and unrepealed, which distinctly permits suspensions by the President in his discretion, and carefully omits the requirement that "evidence and reasons" for his action in the case shall be reported to the Senate?

It is true that the existing law does not in terms require the giving of "evidence and reasons." It does, however, limit the power of suspension. The President can not under the law remove an officer except with the advice and consent of the Senate. He can only suspend for a certain period. The limitation put upon the suspension by the President was for some purpose. What could that purpose have been unless what it seems to have been, namely, to give the Senate an opportunity to determine whether the action of the President was warranted and wise, and to approve that action by confirming the successor named by him, or disapprove it by rejecting? The effect of the law then is to make the Senate unquestionably a party to the act of removal as well as the act of appointment. The law means this, or, it seems to me, means nothing.

That being the case, the Senate has not merely the right to inquire into the action of the Executive in suspending a civil officer, but a duty to inquire is imposed upon the Senate by that law by the only natural and reasonable construction that can be put upon it. The Senate, therefore, is responsible as well as the Executive in the appointment and substitution of civil officers.

NECESSITY OF SENATE'S POWER TO OBTAIN INFORMATION.

A man may be grievously wronged, by removal from an office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, upon charges of wrongdoing, which, though believed by the President, may have no foundation in fact. It is the right of the person so wronged to appeal to this Senate for vindication. Experience has shown that an Executive may be led to suspend upon ex parte statements, and that too, without any very careful inquiry into their truth or falsity.

Can it be that such wrongs can be perpetrated in this country, and, contrary to the legal maxim, have no remedy? I think not. I contend that a duty devolves upon the Senate to see in so far as it can that such wrongs are not perpetrated. How can the Senate discharge that duty intelligently unless they can be made acquainted with the facts? How can Senators say that they consent to and approve the action of the Executive if they are denied all knowledge of the ground of such action? The duty was not imposed upon the Senate without the right by natural implication to get at the information necessary to intelligently discharge it. Where can the information be found? Only in the Executive Departments of the Government. This is now denied us by the Executive. Look, then, at the position of the President! A law stands upon the statute-books, and is one of the laws he has solemnly obligated himself to see faithfully executed. That law, by the only reasonable construction that can be put upon it, imposes a duty upon the Senate, in the discharge of which it is necessary for the Senate to have access to certain papers on file in the Executive Departments. These the President denies to the Senate. He stands, therefore, in the position of blocking by his own act the operation of a law he is bound to see faithfully executed.

Every consideration of justice to the men against whom charges of wrongdoing have been made, every consideration of respect for the law, to say nothing of considerations of courtesy due from one branch of a common government to another, should suggest a prompt compliance on the part of the President with the request of the Senate for papers from the public files upon which he has acted in suspending civil officers. Without such information may not the Senate of the United States make itself party to great wrongs to worthy and deserving citizens by blindly indorsing the action of the Executive, while the law plainly makes it its duty to investigate and act with deliberation?

Or, on the other hand, may not the Senate, for the want of proper information in the premises, commit a wrong on the Government itself, by refusing to consent to the removal of an officer, whose removal the good of the public service really demands?

It may be argued that the Senate should make its own investigation as to the fitness or unfitness of persons who are nominated to or suspended from office. Nothing could be more specious.

These men are suspended, it is to be presumed, upon specific charges made and filed against them. They do not know with what they are charged, or by whom. How can such charges be answered? How can the Senate find out whether the officer was properly suspended?

Suppose, for example, charges are made against a civil officer by a political opponent who wants the office himself, and is so eager to secure it that he will even resort to falsehood and perjury to secure the suspension. Would the Executive put a premium upon perjury by throwing around the statements of such a person the veil of secrecy to protect him from the consequences of his statements falsely made?

In these times, when the "very hungry and very thirsty," the fasters of twenty-five years, are scrambling for seats at the official feast, let us pause and consider before we act.

May we not, if we do not beware, find ourselves confirming men in public offices whose very falsehood or perjury brought about the suspension of those whose places they are nominated to fill. Let me say here, and I believe the record will bear me out, that we have had since the Senate has been in session exactly such a case as that, where it was ascertained that the man had made false representations and he was rejected by the Senate as per consequence.

Will this Senate consent to the removal of an honest public officer and the appointment of a dishonest man in his place? Certainly not. Does the President desire anything of this sort? Surely I think not. Then let him produce the papers upon which suspensions have been made.

These papers are not only necessary for the information of the Senate in deciding upon the propriety of suspensions, but are absolutely necessary in order that we may be fully satisfied whether or not the person nominated is a fit and proper person for the office.

I desire to have it distinctly understood that I am not making these remarks and detaining the Senate because I want any Republican put back in office. That is not the ground we are taking here. We are caring nothing on that subject, so far as I am concerned at least.

The question what constitutes good ground for suspension or removal does not enter here, though I for one am willing to concede large latitude to the Executive in the exercise of his discretion of suspension. Yet the Senate is bound under some circumstances to inquire into reasons for suspension of officers, though not necessarily in all cases. An officer may be suspended for just cause. Common report and general information may justify the suspension. In very many cases the President's action may not be called into question, and the Senate may not feel called upon to do more than approve.

But that is not the position of the Senate to-day with reference to many nominations now before it for action. Hundreds of men who have been suspended from office in whose places nominations have been made are appealing to the Senate for justice, not to get back their office, but to know on what grounds they were removed, having failed to ascertain the ground of suspension from the President. They have been summarily relieved of responsible offices for "cause," as they are given to understand. They are under the stigma of having been removed from office, after the President had proclaimed to the country that he would only suspend for good cause. The Executive has turned a deaf ear to their appeals to be informed what offenses are laid at their doors. In some cases their proffered resignations have been refused only that they might be subjected to the humiliation of being removed from office. They have been given no opportunity to be heard in their own defense, and can not even learn with what crimes they are charged.

I will take the liberty of saying here that I called upon the head of one of the Departments of this Government when he had made a suspension and politely asked him to give me copies of the charges which had been made against the removed or suspended officer, so that he and I might know upon what ground he had been suspended, and to this day I have heard nothing from that distinguished officer upon the subject, and nobody else has heard anything, so far as I know.

Can it be that here in our capital city has been set up a star-chamber court, where citizens are tried, convicted, sentenced, and sentence executed without one word of defense being heard or permitted, and that there exists no authority in the whole Government to question such a cruel and arbitrary power, or outside of the charmed circle no one able to learn the facts on which action is taken? I can not believe it. The idea of trying and convicting a person of charges of any sort without a chance of making a defense is abhorrent to all principles of right and justice.

Grant, if you please, for the sake of the argument, that the President rightly exercises his authority when he suspends from office one whose fault is that he differs from him on political questions. The President may perhaps be justified in making his administration politically harmonious. These questions I am not discussing, because they have nothing to do with the question now at issue.

But, I say, granting the right of the President to remove officers for political reasons, that should not in justice deprive the officer from the right to know the cause of his removal. To be removed from office because of one's honest political belief and principles is no disgrace. To be removed because of failure to do one's duty, or possibly for "offensive partisanship," stands as a blot upon one's record. I say perhaps "offensive partisanship" is disgraceful, for I do not know exactly what it is. It is a newly discovered offense, and not defined by statute. Whatever it is, I say that an officer suspended should be permitted to know the nature of the charges made against him. He should be accorded at least the same consideration as a person would have who should be arraigned in court to answer a criminal charge. I venture the assertion that there is scarcely a Senator within the sound of my voice who does not in his heart believe that simply what we are asking for here, the papers upon which these suspensions have been made, ought to be exhibited so that the world and the man suspended may know what the charges are against him, if there are any.

But the Executive denies to officers whom he dismisses from the service of the Government all knowledge of the cause for their dismissal. He denies to the Senate of the United States that knowledge, while at the same time asking the Senate to approve his acts and make them complete.

I will again concede a point for one moment for the sake of the argument. Suppose the President to be right in his position that the Senate has no legal warrant to call upon him for the papers showing charges against officers whom he has suspended—that such a demand on the part of the Senate is an encroachment upon his prerogative. Is he justified, because of a punctilious regard for a prerogative, in placing under a cloud of disgrace men who have held civil offices, and so far as the world knows or can find out have been guilty of no offense, and denying them the same right that the law of the land accords the meanest thief or criminal? Ought they not at least to be allowed to know with what they are charged?

But I will not admit the existence in one man of such power over the fate and character of citizens. It is incongruous in a government of law. It is only known in countries where one man is the law. It can not be that it exists here.

NATURE OF THE CONTEST.

Let me say that this is not a contest on a part of the majority of the Senate to interfere with the rightful prerogative of the President or to in any way blockade his administration of the law. The Senator from West Virginia, I believe, stated that the real purpose in this inquiry was not to get the papers, but it was to interfere with the President's right to administer this Government as he saw fit, being responsible to the people for its administration. I undertake to say that there is nothing in this discussion outside of what appears upon the record, and that is, substantially, to defend the hundreds of men who have been suspended, after the President and the Postmaster-General had declared that they would remove nobody except for cause when they removed hundreds of men against whom every one in the Senate knows no cause existed, unless it may have been that they were Republicans and not Democrats.

If facts have been furnished the Executive in writing and filed in the Government Departments justifying the suspension of public officers, why not give them? If officers, high or low, have proved recreant to their trusts why shield them from the condemnation they deserve? The mere statement of the Executive that he has suspended, with the implication that it carries that such suspension was deserved, is not sufficient, and the Senate should not, as it can not in my opinion, put upon the action of the President the seal of its approval while he refuses the papers we may require from which to learn the ground of his action in any given case.

Is it true, as we have often been told of late, that "a public office is a public trust," and in the hands of the Executive and the Senate jointly to bestow? Or is it the sole property of the Executive to give and take at will? Is the "advice and consent of the Senate" to a removal a mere perfunctory act to be performed at the behest of the Executive, as his clerk engrosses his letters or his proclamations? Will the gentlemen upon either side admit that they occupy that humiliating position?

We might now assume that the Executive in making suspensions was only attempting to make his administration politically harmonious in all its branches, as has been done under some previous administrations. But, sir, this conclusion is precluded as to the present Executive by his own words. In his letter of acceptance of the Democratic nomination for the office of President Mr. Cleveland used these words:

> The selection and retention of subordinates in Government employment should depend upon their ascertained fitness and the value of their work.

Again, after he had been chosen by the suffrages of the people to fill the high office of President he wrote a letter, which was published, to the National Civil Service Reform League of New York, in which he expressed his approval of the civil-service act, and made the following declaration of his position toward officers coming under the tenure-of-office act:

> There is a class of Government positions which are not within the letter o the civil-service statute, but which are so disconnected with a policy of an administration that the removal therefrom of present incumbents, in my opinion, should not be made during the terms for which they were appointed solely on partisan grounds or for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power.

Can we for one moment suppose that a serious man, chosen by a great party and afterward by the people for the office of President, would pen words of such weighty import in idle jest? Did the President jest when he said that competent officers should be retained until their terms expired, and if removed by him it would be because they were not "decent public servants?" If, then, the President has acted in good faith, he has suspended officers only in cases where they have failed in their duty. Their political opinions have cut no figure. They have been guilty of wrongs of which the world should know, and of which the Senate, a party to such removal, should certainly know.

In his recent message President Cleveland said:

> It has been claimed that the present Executive having pledged himself not to remove officials except for cause, the fact of their suspension implies such misconduct on the part of a suspended official as injures his character and reputation, and therefore the Senate should review the case for his vindication.

A little further on he said:

> If in any degree the suggestion is worthy of consideration, it is to be hoped there may be a defense against unjust suspension in the justice of the Executive.

The "justice of the Executive" forsooth!

> Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

Consider now the reasoning with which a suspended official must content himself: He held an office with a fixed tenure. He was assured by the Executive that he would not be suspended except for good cause. He is nevertheless suspended. He asks what cause existed for the suspension. He is not conscious of having committed any wrong or of having failed in any duty. Therefore, he thinks he is wrongfully suspended. But, while he may not know why he was suspended, or of what he has been accused, he is met by the comforting assurance from the President himself that he is defended from unjust suspension by the infallible "justice of the Executive." The executive justice must be infallible; else what defense can it be against unjust suspension? Hence, having been suspended, the officer must believe—indeed, he is not permitted to doubt—that he has done wrong, though for his life he does not know what wrong he has done, nor can he find out.

This will not do. The theory that the king can do no wrong is long since exploded among enlightened nations. It never had a foothold in this land and never will have.

The President declares in his message that "not a suspension has been made except it appeared to my satisfaction that the public welfare would be improved thereby."

A very diplomatic statement this, but evidently intended to convey the impression that he claims to have kept his pledge to suspend only for good cause. With that view of the meaning of his statement I challenge its correctness. I make the assertion boldly and without fear of successful contradiction that in the State of Illinois public officials have been suspended by the present Executive than whom no more faithful and efficient public servants can be found, and against whom no charge of official misconduct can be sustained. If these men were not suspended simply and solely for political reasons, what in heaven's name were they suspended for?

I am not attempting to shield political friends from the loss of their offices, but I do propose to enter my protest against a secret star chamber trial and conviction of men whom I know and all their neighbors know to be honest men. These offices might be taken from them without injury to their character. It is not the loss to these men of their offices against which I am protesting, but the unwarranted reflection upon their good name which attaches to the manner in which their offices are taken from them. If the President has acted in good faith in these acts of suspension, I assert that he has been deceived. If charges have been filed against these men they should be permitted to examine them in the clear light of day. If no charges stand against them it is but right that the people and these men should know it. Where then are the reasons for concealment in this matter?

I desire for a few moments to refer to a document; and if we could get a report from the Postmaster-General to-day upon the cases of suspensions and removals, including Presidential offices and the fourth-class post-offices as well, all the postmasters whose offices are in that Department, I anticipate that we should get very much such a report as the one I hold in my hand. It is a report by the Postmaster-General in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives—House of Representatives, Executive Document No. 96, Thirty-ninth Congress, second session, dated February 18, 1867, made before the tenure-of-office law was passed in 1867. The report gives a verbatim list of all the men who were suspended and the reasons therefor. "Jacob E. P. Porter," for instance, "removed for political reasons." "William Mills, removed for political reasons," and so on through the list of all the States. This report was made by Postmaster-General Randall in 1867, just a little while before the tenure-of-office law was passed.

Let us see what the showing is that he makes in reference to appointments and removals. The whole number of removals was 1,644. Of this number 1,283 were for political reasons; 92 to give place to soldiers; 64 for failures to bond; 45 were supersedures by change of site of offices; 23 for unfaithfulness in office; 17 were caused by misapprehension of facts in the appointment of postmasters; 17 were caused by postmasters moving away; 16 were caused by postmasters abandoning offices; 8 were for intemperance; 9 because the postmasters were unsatisfactory to the citizens; 8 because of political reasons and neglect of duty; 3 to give place to widows of deceased soldiers; and so on through, giving the whole list of the removals that had been made by that Postmaster-General, and showing exactly the ground upon which each man was removed. The result was that the one or two thousand men who were removed did not go out to the country with their characters blackened by an assumption or presumption based on the position taken by the administration that nobody was to be removed from office except for good cause, but the reason was asserted in connection with each man's name that he was removed for political considerations, or if he was a rascal that fact was announced.

This report was made in February, 1867, and the tenure-of-office law was passed on the 2d of March, 1867, so that it came under the Constitution. The Postmaster-General in those days did not think that he was greater than the great legislative department of the Government, and that he could say, "Thus I will, and thus I will not," but in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, they having nothing to do with his Department so far as confirmations were concerned, the Postmaster-General furnished the list of all removals and gave the specific reasons in each case. If the present Postmaster-General had done that, or even if the administration had not in the first place laid the foundation of beclouding the characters of men who have been removed or suspended, there would have been none of this discussion to-day. But the fact is otherwise. The gentlemen who are out of office care nothing for that fact, I assert, so far as any man in Illinois is concerned, but they do care to know whether any man has sneakingly skulked into the Post-Office Department and filed affidavits there, invited by the Postmaster-General, to blacken their characters, to come up against them perhaps in ten years, or against their family name after they are dead and gone. That is what we want to know here. That is the only reason why I have any feeling upon the subject at all, and I propose, so far as I am concerned, to stand here and defend the honest men who have been in office in Illinois against any unjust aspersions or suppositions upon their honesty of purpose and honesty of action as private citizens and as public officers as well. It is in my opinion contrary to law and a violation of the rights of individuals to deny them this privilege.

Has the President forgotten his own words, when, in accepting the nomination at the hands of the Democratic party for the office of President, he said:

> I believe that public temper is such that the voters of the land are prepared to support the party which gives the best promise of administering the Government in the honest, simple, and plain manner which is consistent with its character and purposes. They have learned that mystery and concealment in the management of their affairs cover tricks and betrayal.

Sir, are there "tricks and betrayal" behind the "mystery and concealment" to which the present administration has resorted? It is for the Executive to show that there are none. The production of the papers called for by the Senate alone will settle the question and satisfy this Senate and the people.

A refusal to produce them must and will be taken by the people as a plea of guilty to "tricks and betrayal," the extent of which the Executive is not willing the country should know.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the real question underlying the resolutions accompanying the report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary is one of unusual importance, affecting the harmonious relations contemplated by the Constitution between the executive and the Senatorial branch of the legislative department. The Duskin case, of course, is simply seized upon as an occasion to raise an issue with the Executive on a grave question of constitutional power. Duskin had ceased, by the expiration of his term, if not by his suspension, to be an officer of the United States before the resolutions were presented. Perhaps his was as good a case as another, for the purpose of the majority reached far beyond that case. It is well also to understand that the first resolution, which declares "That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send copies of the papers called for," &c., is aimed, not at the Attorney-General nor at his refusal, but at the President of the United States, and he who expects him to be guilty of the moral cowardice of yielding his deliberate convictions as to the constitutional powers vested in him as Executive reckons without his host.

On the first day of this month the President sent to the Senate a message in relation to the subject-matter now before the Senate. The resolutions and report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary were then pending. They were condemnatory of the course of the President on the very matter to be tried. Where does the Senate derive authority to condemn the head of a co-ordinate Department of the Government except as a court upon impeachment coming from the people's representatives? But as the Senate had assumed to try, had he not a right to be heard? Who knew as well as he the facts on which he acted? Yet when the message was read, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who had taken the lead in this arraignment, declared from his seat that the message very vividly brought to his mind the communications of King Charles I to Parliament, telling them what they ought and ought not to do, &c. Is the Senate an ex parte inquisition? Is but one side to be heard? Who made the Senate judge over the political Israel of America? Not the Constitution, surely.

Sir, the fatal indecision of character which brought Charles Stuart under the power of Cromwell, and his head to the block, by the sentence of a court organized to convict, will not be found in Grover Cleveland. He who may attempt to play the rôle of Cromwell will find that this is not the country nor this the occasion, for the President stands on firm ground, backed by the Constitution and the people, while the unhappy Charles Stuart was violating the constitution and had estranged the people. The Cromwell has not yet been born who can, in the name of the Senate, grasp the constitutional power vested in the Executive. Still, that the majority will support the resolutions no one doubts, but that they will be condemned by that great body of triers who make Presidents and Senators I have no sort of doubt.

The speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], on behalf of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, was fully up to the expectations of his party friends, among whom his ability, enriched by ripe experience, is recognized. The speech of the young Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] was beyond the expectation of his most sanguine friends, although much was expected. To what they so well said I beg to add my contribution, and I shall present, as concisely as I may be able, the reasons which will control my action. The resolutions of the committee are as follows:

> Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.
> Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January, and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.
> Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers, the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring—

"That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office"—

ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier, whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach, and to give place to another who has not rendered such service, is in violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.

The scope of the resolutions is more fully developed by the majority report and the speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in support of the report and resolutions. The minority present their views and conclusions in a paper of marked ability.

It is well to note that however disguised the motive of the majority may be, the real object is to compel the President, sooner or later, to discover to the Senate the reasons which influenced him in making suspensions and removals. It is an attempt to do indirectly what confessedly can not be done directly. The report which seeks to support and explain the resolutions will, I think, fully sustain this view. That report may be divided into three heads; the first, a collection of what the majority are pleased to consider precedents, and which have no bearing on the real question; the second, an arraignment of the President for what the majority are pleased to term a violation of his pledge, and which is simply a stump speech injected into what ought to be a report on a grave constitutional issue between one of the co-ordinate Departments of the Government and one branch of another, and entirely outside the question at issue; the third part is a twin of the second, being also a stump speech addressed to the soldier element, and manifestly having no relations whatever to the issue. The report is nominally addressed to the Senate, and that is all.

Complaint is made that there have been six hundred and forty-three suspensions under the present administration. The complaint that the people who elected the present Executive make is that there have not been ten times six hundred and forty-three removals. The significance of the election of November, 1884, as I construe it, was a change from Republican to Democratic principles, methods, and policies. A Democratic administration was desired and expected, root, stem, and branch. Genuine civil-service reform demands that the Executive, who is required by the Constitution to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, should have the selection of honest and competent agents, in accord with the policy indicated by his election. Any attempt to conduct an administration through officers hostile to its policy will necessarily prove a failure.

The Republicans—wise in methods—urge a power in the Senate which, if carried out, keeps or aims to keep the "ins" in and the "outs" out, in violation of the will of the people expressed through the ballot-box. And, however much this object may be disclaimed, it results all the same.

THE ISSUE.

Stripped of all unnecessary verbiage, the simple issue is, where and in whom is the power of removal lodged by the Constitution? There is no escape from it, no evasion of it. The minority in the Senate, representing the majority of the people, stand upon the decision of the fathers, recognized from the First Congress under the Constitution, in 1789, by all succeeding Congresses, by the courts, by the commentators, by the people without successful question by any party, Federal, Democrat, Whig, or Republican, down to the year 1867. And then for the first time in the history of this country Congress assumed to control the question of removal from office. I step aside a moment from the line of my argument to sketch the occasion for the act of 1867.

What were the circumstances under which that claim was made? Andrew Johnson occupied the Presidential chair. Angry disputes between him and Congress resulted in complete estrangement and mutual distrust. He had been elected by the Republican party. They believed that he had abandoned their party and returned to the fold of the Democratic party from which he had unhappily strayed; and the Republicans being in an overwhelming majority in both Houses, determined to bend him to their will, or, at all events, to so trammel him that he could not be in the way of their policy. Under these circumstances the act of March 2, 1867, was passed. This act may be found in United States Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 430. I beg to call your attention to the first, second, and sixth sections of the act:

Be it enacted, &c., That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized, at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment, made, had, or exercised, contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate.

This act in the calm light of sober reflection is amazing. It stands out in bold relief without a counterpart in the history of this Government. It shows to what extremes grave legislators may go in times of high party excitement. Two years afterward some of the principal features of this most arbitrary and oppressive act were modified, and others swept from the statute-book, and the act approved April 5, 1869 (volume 16, page 6), was substituted. I read that act, so that its provisions may be contrasted with those of the act of 1867:

An act to amend "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first and second sections of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and in lieu of said repealed sections the following are hereby enacted:

That every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he shall have been appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That during any recess of the Senate the President is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the United States courts, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed in his discretion by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time; and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall, during the time he performs his duties, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of such office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended; and it shall be the duty of the President within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, to nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section 3 of the act to which this is an amendment be amended by inserting after the word "resignation," in line 3 of said section, the following: "or expiration of term of office."

Approved, April 5, 1869.

It will be found by the record of the proceedings of the Forty-first Congress, first session (Congressional Globe, page 40), that the House by the unusually large vote of 138 to 16 voted for the total repeal of the act of 1867. The bill went to the Senate and was amended by striking out the repeal and substituting suspension of the statute till the first day of the next ensuing session. This was rejected by the House. The debate in the two Houses will show that the ablest Republicans in both Houses were in favor of the total repeal or a material modification. After various efforts at compromise the present statute was agreed on, and as I proceed I will show the construction in the House given to the conference report which became the act. The persistency with which the Senator from Vermont and those acting with him held to the principle of Senatorial control embodied in the original act alone retained any of it.

The House was unquestionably for a total repeal. The principle of Senatorial control over removals is retained from the act of 1867 in the act of 1869. And this last act further provides that during any recess of the Senate the President is empowered in his discretion to suspend, &c., thus claiming to grant by law the power of suspension, but conceding it at his discretion. If he is empowered to suspend, what has the Senate to do with it? The Democratic party from its foundation has recognized the power of removal to be vested in the President by the Constitution.

It has been said in this debate that the President possessed the power of removal because prior to 1867 the law conferred it. If by law is meant a statute and not the Constitution the assertion is unwarranted.

The acts of 1789 organizing the Departments of Foreign Affairs, Treasury, and War did not pretend to grant to the President the power of removal, but recognized the fact that the power was already in him by the Constitution, and this fact was constantly recognized till the act of 1867

I now return to the line of argument I was pursuing and from which I digressed in order to embody the facts stated in these remarks in relation to the history of the acts of 1867 and 1869 with a view to their use further on.

First. By Article I, section 1, the Constitution vests in Congress exclusive power of legislation in respect to all matters therein granted.

Second. By Article II, section 1, the executive power is vested in the President.

Third. By Article III, section 1, the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

In these articles and sections the great powers delegated to the United States by the Constitution are partitioned among the three co-ordinate departments of equal dignity and in all respects independent of each other, save and except in the matters specially named in the Constitution. Neither can encroach upon the well-defined boundary of the other, and for convenience I transcribe these sections and the parts of the Constitution which bear upon the question at issue.

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. (Article I, section 1, Constitution.)

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. (Article II, section 1, Constitution.)

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. (Article III, section 1, Constitution.)

He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. (Article II, section 2, clause 2, Constitution.)

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session. (Article II, section 2, clause 3, Constitution.)

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States. (Article II, part of section 3, Constitution.)

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Article II, section 4, Constitution.)

Before he enters on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

The general grant to the President and investiture of executive power is of all executive power, save and except as qualified in the matter of treaties and appointments. The general grant of legislative power to Congress is of all legislative power, save as modified or restricted by clause 2, section 7, Article I, granting to the President a qualified veto power. There is no blending of legislative or executive with judicial powers.

The Constitution declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." He has the vested right, solely and exclusively, to exercise that power, save as it may be qualified by clause 2, section 2, Article II of the Constitution. As to exceptions out of a general power, the Supreme Court says:

This court, in construing the Constitution as to the grants of power to the United States and the restriction upon the States, have ever held that an exception of any particular case presupposes that those which are not excepted are embraced within the grant or prohibition, and when no exception is made in terms none will be made by mere implication or construction. (Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts, 12 Peters, 637; and cites 6 Wheaton, 378; 8 Wheaton, 489, 490; 12 Wheaton, 438; 9 Wheaton, 206, 207, 216.)

If there be in the Constitution an exception to the general grant of executive power to the President it is in what relates to treaties and appointments, and it is with the latter only that it is necessary now to deal. Let us first look into the question of appointment.

IN WHOM IS THE POWER OF APPOINTMENT VESTED?

The language of the Constitution, to my mind, makes the point entirely clear. "He [the President] shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint," &c. The sentence is just as clear as if it had read: "He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he shall appoint," &c. But if there could be a question raised that this is the true meaning, it is settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, Chief-Justice Marshall delivering the opinion, as follows:

First. The nomination. This is the sole act of the President, and is completely voluntary.

Second. The appointment. This is also the act of the President, and is also a voluntary act, though it can only be performed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Third. The commission. To grant a commission to a person appointed might perhaps be deemed a duty enjoined by the Constitution. "He shall," says that instrument, "commission all the officers of the United States." (Page 154.)

And again:

The appointment being the sole act of the President, must be completely evidenced when it is shown that he has done everything to be performed by him. (Page 156.)

Again:

The last act to be done by the President is the signature of the commission. He has then acted upon the advice and consent of the Senate to his own nomination. The time for deliberation is passed. He has decided. His judgment on the advice and consent of the Senate concerning his nomination has been made, and the officer is appointed. The appointment is evidenced by an open, unequivocal act, and being the last act required from the person making it, necessarily excludes the idea of its being, as far as respects the appointment, an inchoate and incomplete transaction. (Page 156.)

UPON WHOM DOES THE RESPONSIBILITY REST?

The responsibility for the faithful execution of the laws by the very terms of the Constitution rests on the President, and in the nature of things the executive power vested in him by the terms of that instrument embraces the power of intrusting this execution to faithful and competent agents, and if he finds one who is faithless or incompetent he not only has the power but it is a solemn duty to remove the faithless or inefficient incumbent.

Power and responsibility must in any well-ordered government go hand in hand.

The President is responsible under his oath of office to the people, not to the Senate. If he willfully fails or criminally neglects to take care that the laws be faithfully executed he is liable to impeachment by the House and trial and conviction by the Senate, sitting not in its legislative, not in its executive, but in its judicial capacity as a court under the Constitution to try the impeachment, and under oath as such court, as follows, administered to each member of the Senate before trial had, to wit: "I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ——, now pending, I will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help me God." And when the Chief Magistrate is on trial the Chief-Justice of the United States presides. Yet in the pending resolutions, the Senate, sitting in its legislative capacity, without impeachment from the House, assumes to condemn the President, and further assumes the power against his will to force him to retain officers whom he can not trust; and yet if the laws are not faithfully executed he may be held criminally responsible, because the Constitution holds him responsible for their due execution. It is true that he might plead that he was forced by the Senate to keep the faithless agents. Who are his triers? The same Senate.

But suppose it should be manifest to the Representatives of the people that the Senate was obstinately obstructing the due execution of the laws, what can the House of Representatives do? They can not impeach Senators, because they are not civil officers of the United States, and it would be folly to impeach an officer in whose favor the triers—the Senate—had already entered judgment. Thus by this bending, this distortion of the Constitution, this destruction of its harmonious arrangement, its great aim, an efficient, faithful administration of the Constitution and laws, is thwarted. I can not conceive how any man can find in the Constitution warrant for the claim that the President can not remove without the consent of the Senate.

The Constitution specially confers upon the Senate the power to "advise and consent" to the appointments—not to make appointments, but to advise and consent to appointments; and when that advice and consent are had the duty of the Senate is performed and the President appoints. But nowhere does the Constitution declare that the Senate shall advise and consent to removals. And as the duties of the Senate are legislative, not executive, and as both appointments and removals are executive in their natures, and in no sense legislative, and as the "advice and consent" to the appointment—not partnership in making the appointment—are superimposed on the executive power of appointment vested in the President and an exception to the general grant, the exception, by all the rules of law, must be strictly construed.

The Senate can extend its power not one whit beyond this special exception, and no other power—removal or any other—can be superimposed upon the limited power of "advice and consent" in matters of appointment. And had the Constitution not specially required the "advice and consent" to appointments, the vested executive power of the President would have clothed him with the sole power of making appointments without such advice and consent, precisely as it now does in matters of removals; for let it be kept in view that "an exception of any particular case" (as in this case "advice and consent" to an appointment) "presupposes that those which are not excepted are embraced within the grant" (as in this case of executive power to the President), and that when "no exception is made in terms," as there undoubtedly is not of "removal" from the general grant of executive power, "none will be made by implication."

I therefore hold that by the very terms of the Constitution the power of removal is vested alone in the President. The term "executive power" is equal to all its parts, and removal is an essential part or element of executive power, and the Constitution in granting executive power to the President necessarily grants the power of removal, and it nowhere restricts its exercise.

Those who claim that the appointment is the joint production of the President and Senate insist that the power of removal is an incident of the power of appointment, that the same power which appoints can remove, and that removals can not otherwise be effected. To my mind this is a transparent fallacy. Senators are appointed by State Legislatures; Representatives, by the people; the people, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, appoint the President; the President, the Senate advising and consenting, appoints judges; but in not one of these cases does the power which appoints remove. I do not place the power of removal as an incident to the power of appointment, but it is, in my judgment, clearly a substantive power vested in the President by the Constitution, to the end that he may "take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

But if the position that the same power which appoints must remove have any force and prove anything, it proves too much for its advocates; for if the argument I have made and the authorities offered, including the decisions of the Supreme Court, prove anything, they prove that the President appoints, and so by that theory the President may remove.

But before passing to a consideration of the tenure-of-office act of 1867, amended by the act of 1869, I wish to fortify the argument already made by authorities which will command the respect of all, and I shall quote copiously, not only because of the great weight of the distinguished characters whom I shall cite, but because the authorities are not all of ready access to the people who will read the debate now going on.

in the House of Representatives, on the very question now before the Senate, has never been surpassed in research or ability in the deliberations of Congress or any other deliberative body. It was conducted on all sides with that dignity and decorum which should mark all debates, but especially one involving a question of constitutional construction of the highest moment. This debate was opened in the House of Representatives May 19, 1789, on a motion of Mr. Madison as follows:

Mr. Madison moved that it is the opinion of the committee that there shall be established an executive department, to be denominated the department of foreign affairs, at the head of which there shall be an officer to be called the secretary to the department of foreign affairs, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and to be removable by the President. That there shall be a Treasury Department, &c. That there shall be a War Department, &c. Mr. Vining seconded the motion. (Annals First Congress, volume 1, pages 370, 371.)

Many of the ablest minds in that Congress, a number who had participated in framing the Constitution, and all contemporaries of its framers, took part in the debate, among whom were Mr. Madison, Mr. Boudinot, Mr. Ames, Mr. Sedgwick, Mr. Smith of South Carolina, Mr. Goodhue, Mr. Gerry, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Clymer, Mr. Benson, and Roger Sherman. Mr. Madison at the outset of the debate spoke as follows:

I think it absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removing from office; it will make him, in a peculiar manner, responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States, or neglects to superintend their conduct, so as to check their excesses. On the constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt.

And again, at a later day, Mr. Madison said:

It is evidently the intention of the Constitution that the First Magistrate should be responsible for the executive department; so far, therefore, as we do not make the officers who are to aid him in the duties of that department responsible to him he is not responsible to his country. Again, is there no danger that an officer, when he is appointed by the concurrence of the Senate, and has friends in that body, may choose rather to risk his establishment on the favor of that branch than rest it upon the discharge of his duties to the satisfaction of the executive branch, which is constitutionally authorized to inspect and control his conduct? And if it should happen that the officers connect themselves with the Senate they may mutually support each other, and for want of efficacy reduce the power of the President to a mere vapor; in which case his responsibility would be annihilated and the expectation of it unjust.

And further on in the same speech:

The question now resolves itself into this, Is the power of displacing an executive power? I conceive that if any power whatever is in its nature executive, it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws. If the Constitution had not qualified the power of the President in appointing to office, by associating the Senate with him in that business, would it not be clear that he would have the right, by virtue of his executive power, to make such appointment? Should we be authorized, in defiance of that clause in the Constitution, "The executive power shall be vested in a President," to unite the Senate with the President in the appointment to office? I conceive not. If it is admitted that we should not be authorized to do this, I think it may be disputed whether we have a right to associate them in removing persons from office, the one power being as much of an executive nature as the other; and the first only authorized by being excepted out of the general rule established by the Constitution in these words: "The executive power shall be vested in the President."

The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, but will gentlemen say the judicial power can be placed elsewhere, unless the Constitution has made an exception? The Constitution justifies the Senate in exercising a judiciary power in determining on impeachment; but can the judicial power be further blended with the powers of that body? They can not. I therefore say it is incontrovertible, if neither the legislative nor judicial powers are subjected to qualifications other than this demand in the Constitution, that the executive powers are equally unabatable as either of the others; and inasmuch as the power of removal is of an executive nature, and not affected by any constitutional exception, it is beyond the reach of the legislative body.

I invite your attention to the following able and lucid argument of Mr. Boudinot:

Mr. BOUDINOT. This is a question, Mr. Speaker, that requires full consideration, and ought only to be settled on the most candid discussion. It certainly involves the right of the Senate to a very important power. At present, I am so impressed with the importance of the subject that I dare not absolutely decide on any principle, although I am firmly persuaded we ought to retain the clause in the bill; and, so far as it has been examined, I agree that it is a legislative construction of the Constitution necessary to be settled for the direction of your officers. But if it is a deviation from the Constitution, or in the last degree an infringement upon the authority of the other branch of the Legislature, I shall most decidedly be against it. But I think it will appear, on a full consideration of this business, that we can do no otherwise than agree to this construction, in order to preserve to each department the full exercise of its powers, and to give this House security for the proper conduct of the officers who are to execute the laws.

The arguments adduced are to show that the power of removal lies either in the President and Senate, or the President alone, except in the cases of removal by impeachment. There is nothing, I take it, in the Constitution, or the reason of the thing, that officers should be only removable by impeachment. Such a provision would be derogatory to the powers of Government and subversive of the rights of the people. What says the Constitution on the point? (I fear, sir, it has not been rightly comprehended.) That the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment; that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; and judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold it in future. Then comes the clause declaring absolutely that he shall be removed from office on impeachment for and on conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors.

It is this clause which guards the rights of the House and enables them to pull down an improper officer, although he should be supported by all the power of the Executive. This, then, is a necessary security to the people, and one that is wisely provided in the Constitution. But I believe it is nowhere said that officers shall never be removed but by impeachment; but it says they shall be removed on impeachment. Suppose the Secretary of Foreign Affairs shall misbehave and we impeach him; notwithstanding the clearest proof of guilt, the Senate might only impose some trifling punishment and retain him in office, if it were not for this declaration in the Constitution.

Neither this clause nor any other goes so far as to say it shall be the only mode of removal; therefore we may proceed to inquire what the other is. Let us examine whether it belongs to the Senate and President. Certainly, sir, there is nothing that gives the Senate this right in express terms; but they are authorized, in express words, to be concerned in the appointment. And does this necessarily include the power of removal? If the President complains to the Senate of the misconduct of an officer and desires their advice and consent to the removal, what are the Senate to do? Most certainly they will inquire if the complaint is well founded. To do this they must call the officer before them to answer. Who, then, are the parties? The supreme executive officer against his assistant; and the Senate are to sit as judges to determine whether sufficient cause of removal exists. Does not this set the Senate over the head of the President? But suppose they shall decide in favor of the officer, what a situation is the President then in, surrounded by officers with whom by his situation he is compelled to act, but in whom he can have no confidence, reversing the privilege given him by the Constitution, to prevent his having officers imposed upon him who do not meet his approbation.

But I have another more solid objection which places the question in a more important point of view. The Constitution has placed the Senate as the only security and barrier between the House of Representatives and the President. Suppose the President has desired the Senate to concur in removing an officer and they have declined; or suppose the House has applied to the President and Senate to remove an officer obnoxious to them and they determine against the measure, the House can have recourse to nothing but an impeachment, if they suppose the criminality of the officer will warrant such a procedure. Will the Senate then be that upright court which they ought to appeal to on this occasion when they have prejudged your cause? I conceive the Senate will be too much under the control of their former decision to be a proper body for this House to apply to for impartial justice.

As the Senate are the dernier ressort and the only court of judicature which can determine on cases of impeachment, I am for preserving them free and independent, both on account of the officer and this House. I therefore conceive that it was never the intention of the Constitution to vest the power of removal in the President and Senate; but, as it must exist somewhere, it rests on the President alone. I conceive this point was made fully to appear by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] inasmuch as the President is the supreme executive officer of the United States.

Mr. Vining, in reply to Mr. White's proposition that the same power that appoints must remove, and, according to Mr. White, the President and Senate appoint, and therefore it takes the President and Senate to remove, said:

It may be contended, on the gentleman's principles, that the President shall have the power of removal because it is he who appoints. The Constitution says he shall nominate and, under certain qualifications, appoint. The Senate do not appoint; their judgment only is required to acquiesce in the President's nomination. Where, then, is the natural responsibility placed? Because, where that is, ought to be the power of removal. The Constitution contemplates no other principle. If we were to insert a contrary one, the Government must go to destruction.

Mr. Boudinot, in another speech from the one before quoted, said:

Now, let us take the Constitution, and consider, from the terms and principles of it, in whom this power is vested. It is said by some gentlemen to be an omitted case; I shall take up the other principle, which is easier to be maintained, that it is not an omitted case, and say the power of removal is vested in the President. I shall also take up the principle laid down by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. White] at the beginning of his argument, that agreeable to the nature of all executive powers, it is right and proper that the person who appoints should remove. This leads me to consider in whom the appointment is vested by the Constitution. The President nominates and appoints; he is further expressly authorized to commission all officers. Now, does it appear from this distribution of power that the Senate appoints? Does an officer exercise powers by authority of the Senate? No; I believe the President is the person from whom he derives his authority. He appoints, but under a check; it is necessary to obtain the consent of the Senate; but after that is obtained, I ask who appoints? Who vests the officer with authority? Who commissions him? The President does these acts by his sole power, but they are exercised in consequence of the advice of another branch of the Government. If, therefore, the officer receives his authority and commission from the President, surely the removal follows as coincident.

And further on in the same speech he declared:

Gentlemen say they have a sufficient remedy for every evil likely to result from connecting the Senate with the President. This they propose to do by allowing the power of suspension. This, in the first place, does not answer the end, because there is a possibility that the officer may not be displaced after a hearing before the Senate; and, in the second place, it is entirely inconsistent with the whole course of reasoning pursued by the gentlemen in opposition. I would ask them if the Constitution does not give to the President the power of removal, what part is it that gives the power of suspension? If you will in one case construe the Constitution, you may do it in another, for I look upon it as dangerous to give the power of suspension by implication as to give the full power of removal. Gentlemen, observe that I take it for granted that the President has no express right to the power of suspension, and that if he is to exercise it, it must be drawn by constructive reasoning alone from the Constitution. If we are to exercise our authority, we had better at once give a power that would answer two valuable purposes than one altogether nugatory. In the first place, it would entirely separate the legislative and executive departments conformably to the great principles of the Constitution; and, in the second place, it would answer the end of the Government better and secure real benefits to the Union.

And this may be found in the same speech:

These being the principles on which I have formed my opinion, in addition to what was stated, I do conceive that I am perfectly justified to my constituents and to my oath to support this construction. And when I give my vote that the President ought to have the power of removal from office, I do it on principle; and gentlemen in the opposition will leave us to the operation of our judgments on this as well as every other question that comes before us. For my part, I conceive it is impossible to carry into execution the powers of the President in a salutary manner unless he has the power of removal vested in him. I do not mean that if it was not vested in him by the Constitution it would be proper for Congress to confer it; though I do believe the Government would otherwise be very defective, yet we would have to bear this inconvenience until it was rectified by an amendment of the Constitution. For my part, I would adhere to every principle contained in it, however defective, and not infringe it for any purpose whatever. In so doing we shall be justified by our constituents and have nothing to dread from these apprehensions which have been held out; because I trust in the good sense of our fellow-citizens that while we do our duty, they will not be backward on their part to conform to theirs.

Mr. Madison in the progress of the debate said:

I do not conceive that this question has been truly stated by some gentlemen. In my opinion it is not whether we shall take the power from one branch of the Government and give it to another; but the question is, to which branch has the Constitution given it?

Mr. Ames said:

It must be admitted that the Constitution is not explicit on the point in contest; yet the Constitution strongly infers that the power is in the President alone. It is declared that the executive power shall be vested in the President. Under these terms all the powers properly belonging to the executive department of the Government are given, and such only taken away as are expressly excepted. If the Constitution had stopped here, and the duties had not been defined, either the President had had no powers at all or he would acquire from that general expression all the powers properly belonging to the executive department. In the Constitution the President is required to see the laws faithfully executed. He can not do this without he has a control over officers appointed to aid him in the performance of his duty. Take this power out of his hands, and you virtually strip him of his authority; you virtually destroy his responsibility—the great security which this Constitution holds out to the people of America.

* * * * * * *

The President, I contend, has expressly the power of nominating and appointing, though he must obtain the consent of the Senate. He is the agent; the Senate may prevent his acting, but can not act themselves. It may be difficult to illustrate this point by examples which will exactly correspond. But suppose the case of an executor, to whom is devised land, to be sold with the advice of a certain person, on certain conditions; the executor sells, with the consent, and upon the conditions required in the will; the conditions are broken—may the executor re-enter for the breach of them? Or, has the person with whom he was obliged to consult in the sale any power to restrain him? The executor may remove the wrongful possessor from the land, though perhaps by the will he may hold it in trust for another person's benefit. In this manner the President may remove from office, though when vacant he can not fill it without the advice of the Senate.

We are told it is dangerous to adopt constructions, and that what is not expressly given is retained. Surely it is as improper in this way to confer power upon the Senate as upon the President; for, if the power is not in the President solely by the Constitution, it never can be in the President and Senate by any grant of that instrument. Any arguments, therefore, that tend to make the first doubtful, operate against the other, and make it absurd. If gentlemen, then, doubt with respect to the first point, they will certainly hesitate with respect to the other. If the Senate have not the power, and it is provided that they have it not, by the arguments on both sides, the power either vests with the President or the Legislature; if it is at the disposal of the latter, and merely a matter of choice with us, clearly we ought not to bestow it on the Senate, for the doubt whether the President is not already entitled to it is an argument against placing it in other hands.

* * * * * * *

The executive department should ever be independent and sufficiently energetic to defeat the attempts of either branch of the Legislature to usurp its prerogative. But the proposed control of the Senate is setting that body above the President; it tends to establish an aristocracy.

Mr. Baldwin said:

The main ground on which the question is made to rest is that, if we adopt this clause we violate the Constitution. Many of the gentlemen who advocate the present motion for striking out, would, if they could do it with consistency to the Constitution, be in favor of the clause. We have been reminded of our oaths and warned not to violate the solemn obligation. This injunction has come from so many parts of the House that it arrested my whole attention for a few minutes; and then they produced us the clause in the Constitution, which directed that officers should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They then tell us that they should be removable in the same manner. We see the clause by which it is directed that they should be appointed in that manner, but we do not see the clause respecting their removal in the same way. Gentlemen have only drawn it as an inference from the former; they construe that to be the meaning of the Constitution, which we construe the reverse. I hope, therefore, gentlemen will change their expression, and say we shall violate their construction of the Constitution and not the Constitution itself. This will be a very different charge, unless the gentlemen pretend to support the doctrine of infallibility, as it respects their decisions; and that would, perhaps, be more than the House would be willing to admit, and more than the people in this country are accustomed to believe.

* * * * * * *

Gentlemen proceed in their constructions, and they ask, why did not the convention insert a clause in the Constitution declaring the removal to be in a manner different from the appointment? They tell us that it must naturally have occurred to them, and that here and there was the proper place to insert such a clause. Now, let me ask them also, if theirs is the natural construction, why the convention, after declaring that officers should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, did not add to be removed in like manner? It must have as naturally occurred to insert the one as the other. It is very possible that such a clause might have been moved and contended for; but it is hardly probable it would meet with success from those who opposed giving the Senate any check or control whatsoever over the powers of the President, much less was it probable that those gentlemen who opposed it there should wish to enlarge it by construction; for my part, I hope to never see it increased in this way. What of this nature is brought in by the letter of the Constitution, let it be there; but let us never increase evils of which we have some right to complain.

Mr. Vining said:

Suppose the President desires to remove a bad officer and the Senate refuse; what is to become of your impeachment? I say, sir, that the House of Representatives, combined with your Executive, would be unable to procure the dismission of an officer who is hourly betraying his trust, and that in the most open, flagitious manner. If your proofs are clear as a mathematical demonstration, it is all in vain; your tribunal, which is to decide upon the impeachment, has prejudged the question.

* * * * * * *

Who, let me ask, is the Chief Magistrate under this Government? The President. What are his duties? To see the laws faithfully executed; if he does not do this effectually he is responsible. To whom? To the people. Have they the means of calling him to account, and punishing him for neglect? They have secured it in the Constitution by impeachment, to be presented by their immediate representatives; if they fail here they have another check when the time of election comes around. But what are the duties, and what is the responsibility of the Senators? In their legislative capacity it is not intended that they shall assist the President; it is an additional executive authority. Is it compatible with the principles of the Constitution that the Legislature should assume executive power, or is it done in order to make itself responsible? Surely not. But if it was admissible, what degree of responsibility is acquired through the Senate? They are not the representatives of the people; they are the representatives of the State sovereignties, as was well observed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scott]; who are nothing less than accountable to the people. They may have a policy to pursue not altogether consistent with the salus populi, and are only responsible to the State sovereignties.

I call your attention to the following very able argument of Mr. Sedgwick:

Why, therefore, will gentlemen contend that the influence which one branch of the Legislature has over the Executive vests that branch with executive powers? The doctrine of the Constitution is the reverse of this. I shall not undertake to say that it is with more plausibility contended that the power of removal is constitutionally in the President; because the powers of government being distributed among distinct bodies, and all executive powers being invested in him, he, therefore, has it of course. But I think the fact may be as fairly inferred upon the principle of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. White] in favor of the President, who expressly nominates and appoints, as in favor of the President and Senate. But these arguments have been held up in so many points of view that it will be time misspent further to dwell upon them; it was with another view that I arose.

It will be agreed on all hands that this officer, without observing on the subject at large, is merely to supply a natural incompetency in man. In other words, if we could find a President capable of executing this and all other business assigned to him, it would be unnecessary to introduce any other officer to aid him. It is, then, merely from necessity that we institute such an office; because all the duties detailed in the bill are, by the Constitution, pertaining to the department of Executive Magistrate. If the question respected the expediency I should be content to advocate it on that ground. If expediency is at all to be considered, gentlemen will perceive that this man is as much an instrument in the hands of the President as the pen is the instrument of the secretary in corresponding with foreign courts. If, then, the secretary of foreign affairs is the mere instrument of the President, one would suppose, on the principle of expediency, this officer should be dependent upon him. It would seem incongruous and absurd that an officer who, in the reason and nature of things, is dependent on his principal, and appointed merely to execute such business as is committed to the charge of his superior (for this business, I contend, is committed solely to his charge), I say it would be absurd in the highest degree to continue such a person in office contrary to the will of the President, who is responsible that the business be conducted with propriety, and for the general interest of the nation.

The President is made responsible; and shall he not judge of the talents, abilities, and integrity of his instruments? Will you depend on a man who has imposed upon the President, and continue him in office when he is evidently disqualified, unless he can be moved by impeachment? If this idea should prevail, which God forbid, what would be the result? Suppose even that he should be removable by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, what a wretched situation might not our public councils be involved in!

Suppose the President has a secretary in whom he discovered a great degree of ignorance, or a total incapacity to conduct the business he has assigned him; suppose him inimical to the President, or suppose any of the great variety of cases which would be good cause for removal and impress the propriety of such a measure strongly on the mind of the President without any other evidence than what exists in his own ideas, from a contemplation of the man's conduct and character day by day—what, let me ask, is to be the consequence if the Senate are to be applied to? If they are to do anything in this business, I presume they are to deliberate, because they are to advise and consent. If they are to deliberate, you put them between the officer and the President. They are then to inquire into the causes of removals; the President must produce his testimony. How is the question to be investigated? Because I presume there must be some rational rule for conducting this business. Is the President to be sworn to declare the whole truth and to bring forward facts? Or are they to admit suspicion as testimony? Or is the word of the President to be taken at all events? If so, this check is not of the least efficacy in nature.

But if proof be necessary what is then the consequence? Why, in nine cases out of ten, where the case is very clear to the mind of the President that the man ought to be removed, the effect can not be produced, because it is absolutely impossible to produce the necessary evidence. Are the Senate to proceed without evidence? Some gentlemen contend not. Then the object will be lost. Shall a man, under these circumstances, be saddled upon the President who has been appointed for no other purpose but to aid the President in performing certain duties? Shall he be continued, I ask again, against the will of the President? If he is, where is the responsibility? Are you to look for it in the President, who has no control over the officer, no power to remove him if he acts unfeelingly or unfaithfully? Without you make him responsible you weaken and destroy the strength and beauty of your system. What is to be done in cases which can only be known from a long acquaintance with the conduct of an officer?

POWER OF REMOVAL.

I read from the decision in ex parte Hennen, as follows:

The power of removal from office was a subject much disputed, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate; and the great question was, whether the removal was to be by the President alone, or with the concurrence of the Senate, both constituting the appointing power.

But it was very early adopted as the practical construction of the Constitution, that this power was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution.

These are the words of Mr. Justice Thompson in deciding the matter of Duncan M. Hennen, January 7, 1839 (13 Peters, page 258). And I cite from 1 Court of Claims Reports, in the case of Gratiot v. United States. After quoting from Story on the Constitution, the court adds:

He then gives the history of removals and of the question whether such power should be exercised by the President and Senate or by the President alone; and he states the fact that in 1789 Congress affirmed the power in the President alone.

This power in the President has never been questioned since, either as to civil or military officers.

This was the language of Loring, J., October 2, 1865, 1 Court of Claims Reports, page 260.

WHERE IS THE POWER OF REMOVAL LODGED?—THE VARIOUS POSITIONS ON THIS POINT.

It will be observed that in the great debate of 1789 the positions argued were:

First. The power of removal is in the President as an essential part of the executive power vested in him by the Constitution.

Second. The power of removal is incident to the power to appoint, and as the advice and consent of the Senate are necessary before an appointment can be made the power of removal is conjointly in the President and Senate.

Third. The Constitution provides the only grounds of removal, to wit, by removal from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanor, and having provided that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments, no other mode or manner of removal can be exercised.

Fourth. That the Constitution not having in express terms vested the power in any one of the co-ordinate Departments, it is within the appropriate purview of Congress to provide for removals under its power to make all laws necessary to carry into execution the granted powers, and those who take this position assume that the power must in the nature of things be embraced in some of the granted powers.

Fifth. That the matter of removal is a case omitted, and strangely enough argue that the omission may be supplied by legislation.

I have never heard of any other positions.

The weakness of the second, third, fourth, and fifth positions was abundantly shown in the debates of 1789, and it was decided that the power of removal was vested by the Constitution alone in the President, which settlement stood the test of assault for a period of seventy-eight years, until the unhappy controversy arose between President Johnson and Congress in 1867. The calm, temperate, logical debate by the contemporaries of the Constitution assuredly should have more weight than a decision arrived at for a special purpose and under the pressure of high party excitement; and the vote of the House in 1869, only two years later, shows that a large majority of the Representatives of the same party (Republican) which enacted the law believed that the time had come when the law should be repealed and a return made to the path which had been followed for more than three-quarters of a century, blazed by the fathers.

UNITY INCREASES EFFICIENCY AND RESPONSIBILITY.

Chancellor Kent says:

Unity increases not only the efficiency but the responsibility of the executive power. Every act can be immediately traced and brought home to the proper agent. * * * There will be much less temptation to depart from duty, and much greater solicitude for reputation when there are no partners to share the odium or to communicate confidence by their example. (1 Kent's Commentaries, side page 272, and cites Constitution of England, De Lolme, page 111.)

Whether this unity is broken by the imposition of a council or an unwarranted joining of the Senate with the President in matters of removal, the unity is equally destroyed, the responsibility intended by the Constitution to be in the Executive is divided, jarring and confusion are inevitable, and an unseemly wrangle of this unnatural and forced partnership offends the people and brings trouble and discord in the body-politic.

Justice Story says:

But independent of any of the lights derived from history, it is obvious that a division of the executive power between two or more persons must always tend to produce dissensions and fluctuating counsels. (Story on Constitution, section 1423.)

Is not the spectacle now exhibited before the American people conclusive evidence of the wisdom of the above remark of Justice Story? In violation of the unbroken precedent of seventy-eight years, in which at one time or another Federals, Democrats, Whigs, and Republicans had controlled the administration, a dangerous departure was taken in time of high excitement, and to-day behold the evil! Is there any man so blind as not to see the object of the majority of the Judiciary Committee in this struggle? I leave the question as to the matter of appointment and removal upon the argument I have endeavored to make and upon the supporting authorities cited, and confidently maintain that these points are established, namely:

First. That the sole power of appointment is in the President, but as a condition precedent to its exercise the advice and consent of the Senate must be had.

Second. The executive power is vested by the Constitution in the President, and the power to remove is an executive power, in which, by the Constitution, the Senate has no part with the President. The power of removal is in him and him only.

And the question thus settled by the First Congress, sustained by the courts and commentators, acquiesced in by both Houses of Congress and by the people, is too deeply embedded by principle, precedent, judicial authority, and acquiescence to be overturned.

THE SENATE HAS NO CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY FOR THE DEMAND MADE.

If the argument is sound and authorities reliable, it follows irresistibly that the Senate has no constitutional power to demand of the President his reasons for removing an officer, or the evidence, documentary or parol, which moved him to the removal. It is clear that if the Senate had the constitutional right claimed, it has also the right to demand the parol statements made to the President in support of a removal, to send for books, persons, and papers, and open a high court of conscience, or a court of scandal if you please, with the President for the accused, and the suspended officer for prosecutor. Admit the power claimed and all else follows.

The Constitution fortunately has circumscribed the boundary of the three great departments, and recognizes no superiority of one over the other, and gives to the Senate no power over the conduct of the President accused by it of dereliction, nor at all unless the people's representatives bring the alleged offender by impeachment found by the grand inquest before the Senate for trial. The Senate has no more right to require or demand of the President the papers or verbal communications on which he acts in removals than he has to demand the motives of the Senate or the testimony on which it acts in rejecting a nomination.

The whole claim is without the shadow of constitutional warrant. The President is not responsible in any sense to the Senate. He is responsible to the people, and if he is guilty of an impeachable offense, he is responsible therefor to the people's representatives, and if impeached by them, then, and then only, is the Senate called on to act.

If the power of removal is in the President, he acts on the responsibility involved in the grant of executive power vested in him by the Constitution. It is he, not the Senate, who is required by the Constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and should the Senate by its action compel the retention of bad men or inefficient men, it is invading the executive power vested by the Constitution in the President.

THE SENATE IS NOT SUSTAINED BY THE TENURE-OF-OFFICE ACT.

But has the Senate, under the act as found on the statute-book, the right to inquire directly or indirectly into the motives of the President for suspension?

It is clear that their purpose is to compel a disclosure of his motives. It is too clear to be successfully disputed. The papers addressed to the discretion of the President by any one and every one in office and out of office who sees proper to write to him are to be laid before this tribunal, and from them, ignoring verbal communications, the triers assume that the President must have reached his decision. Therefore when the papers are had the object is accomplished; the reasons, as they will assume, which influenced the President's discretion, are disclosed. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in a debate to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the present session, February 9, No. 37, page 1176, says:

The Senator from Delaware asks me why we should try to control the exercise of the discretion of the President? Nobody proposes to do it. He is as independent as we are; but he must not control our discretion. He must not prevent us from having the same sources of information that he has. The information comes to him first, because he performs the first act in appointment; that is, he makes the nomination? Was the former incumbent an unfit man, was he a corrupt man, a thief, or defaulter, or the like? Our discretion must be enlightened by the information that he has; and I say, therefore, that we have the right to call for that information.

The Senator says nobody proposes to control the President's discretion, yet his argument is that the Senate does have that right, does propose to pass judgment on his decision, and to determine whether or not the officer was righfully suspended, although by the terms of the law the President is empowered the sole judge of the question of suspension, and is authorized to act on his own discretion in making the suspension.

During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized in his discretion to suspend, and that suspension continues until the end of the next session of the Senate. Then he is directed to nominate within thirty days after the commencement of each session persons in the place of all persons suspended. Is the Senate called on by that act to advise and consent to the suspension? So far from it, the act vests the President with the power to suspend at his discretion the officer until the adjournment of the next ensuing session. As the officer is lawfully suspended, and as the Senate is not required to advise and consent thereto, what has the Senate to do with it?

The President by the act is instructed to nominate, &c., and the nominee, it is admitted, can not be appointed except upon the advice and consent of the Senate. Here it has the right to investigate the character of the nominee, but manifestly the act contemplates vesting the President with the power to suspend an officer for reasons satisfactory to him to the end that he might take care that the laws be faithfully executed, reserving to the Senate its constitutional power of looking to the qualifications of the nominee before giving advice and consent to his appointment. And this is the more manifest when the acts of March 2, 1867, and of April 5, 1869, are compared and contrasted, and we consider the mischief complained of in the act of 1867 and the remedy applied by the act of 1869. I have already quoted both acts in full.

It seems to me that gentlemen who insist that the Senate has the right to look into the reasons for suspension as a predicate for action upon the nomination wholly overlook the act of 1869, and argue as if the act of 1867, and the whole of it, is in full force. That the act of 1867 was regarded by an overwhelming majority of both Houses as oppressive is manifest. The House by a vote of 138 yeas to 16 nays passed a bill to repeal the tenure-of-office act of March 2, 1867. (Congressional Globe, first session Forty-first Congress, 1869, March 10, page 40.) Among the yeas may be found all of those members of the Senate now who were then in the House, Messrs. ALLISON, BECK, CONGER, DAWES, LOGAN, VOORHEES—two Democrats and four Republicans. The expression in the Senate was quite general for a total repeal or material modification. The debate in the Senate as well as in the House is instructive. There was no debate in the House on the passage of the bill, but a free debate on the various conference reports. It was with manifest reluctance that the House agreed to any amendment, preferring, as shown by their vote, a decided and strong preference for unconditional repeal. It will be seen that Mr. Bingham, of the House Judiciary Committee and of the conference committee, explained to the House the effect of the bill as agreed on in conference. I call attention to this—the question of Mr. Davis and the answer of Mr. Bingham:

Mr. DAVIS (Republican). Does the first section of the Senate amendment remain untouched, according to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. BINGHAM (Republican). It does. But the first and second sections of the tenure-of-office law are wholly repealed, and there is inserted in lieu of those sections the first section of the amendment of the Senate and the second section as amended by the conference committee. In other words, the limitations upon the power of the Executive imposed by the first and second sections of the original tenure-of-office act are wholly repealed.—Congressional Globe, first session Forty-first Congress, page 402.

Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts (then Republican), also of the conference committee, said:

I will endeavor to give my understanding of the report of the committee in connection with the provisions of the bill and the Constitution. It will be observed that the Senate amendment provides for the suspension of an officer by the President and the designation of some person to fill his place till the end of the next session of Congress. That is done in his discretion. Then it further provides that the designated officer shall have all the powers and emoluments of the office. Then it further provides that the Senate may vote first upon the nomination sent in by the President to fill the vacancy, which shall be done within thirty days, and if the Senate declines to agree to his nomination, then the suspended officer may be reinstated, and the President can not put him out; for, although he might suspend him again after the end of the session, yet I do not think that would be within the spirit of the law, after a vote of the Senate under the provision of the amendment, which says there may be an affimative vote on the suspension.

Now, the amendment agreed to by the committee of conference strikes out all that gives the Senate power to reinstate a suspended officer, but provides that where the Senate refuse to concur in the nomination of a person in the place of the suspended officer, then the President shall send in another nomination. This leaves the effect of the constitutional provision and of the other section of the act just this: That if the President does not send in a satisfactory nomination, then the place remains vacant at the end of the session, precisely as it is now under the Constitution, independent of the tenure-of-office law, with the power in the President to again suspend the objectionable officer, if the construction is not as it is claimed, that the office then is in abeyance, or vacant, which is the same thing.

In other words, as I understand this, it is practically only the substitution of a power of suspension instead of a power of removal with all the effect of a power of removal, supposing the tenure-of-office law was not in existence. I should have preferred to have arrived at the like result which this amendment does by the shorter way of repealing the tenure-of-office law, and I am free to say that I think this amendment upon the question of removal and reinstatement of officers leaves the tenure-of-office act as though it never had been passed so far as the power of the President over the executive officers is concerned.

The first section of the amendment to which my attention is called by my colleague [Mr. BANKS] of course leaves the power over removal in terms as it stands in the tenure bill. But the second section substitutes the power of suspension. The contest between the Senate and the House in that matter is upon the difference between the power of suspension and the power of removal; suspension having in effect all the incidents that removal has. That is all the difference. In its practical workings it is a difference in name in my judgment, and upon a difference in name I think the two Houses ought not to divide in a matter of this importance. That is to say, the first section says an officer shall not be removed without the advice and consent of the Senate; but the second section says he may be suspended and another man put in his place, and in case the other man is satisfactory to the Senate, then the officer is removed and the substitute becomes the officer; but in case the substitute is not satisfactory to the Senate, then the place becomes vacant and the officer is removed in that way.

A MEMBER. That operates as a removal.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Practically that operates as a removal. I do not think—and every member, I apprehend, will agree with me in that—the power of the President is changed from what it is under the Constitution or the power of any officer to hold on, as against the President. Just see where he would have more power under the Constitution. He has power to nominate an officer in case of a vacancy while the Senate is in session. They may or they may not concur. Suppose they do not concur. The session comes to an end and there is a vacancy.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very glad to answer any question.

Mr. LOGAN. As the bill now stands, with the report of the committee of conference, is not the difference between it and a repeal the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum—leaving four sections for the punishment of men violating a law which does not exist?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Perhaps I should not state it quite as broadly as the gentleman does, but in practice I think the difference is right the other way—between tweedledum and tweedledee. [Laughter.]—Congressional Globe, first session Forty-first Congress, page 403.

I call your attention to the remarks of Mr. LOGAN on the conference report, showing clearly and tersely his understanding of the report as agreed on, which is the act as it now stands:

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire more than a few minutes of time. I have been one of those in favor of the repeal of this law, and whether satisfied or not with the report of the committee of conference I shall vote for it, and desire to give my reasons for so doing.

The objection to the amendment from the Senate the other day was this: they provided in that amendment that the President should have the right to suspend from office, but if the person nominated or designated in his place should not be confirmed by the Senate, then if the Senate affirmatively refused to concur in the suspension, the suspended officer should again be clothed with official robes. My objection was this, if they should concur in the nomination, then if the Senate should stop right there and take no further action the office would become vacant; but if the Senate at a future time should vote affirmatively against the suspension, then it revived the office in the party suspended. That was my objection to it, and for this reason, in the provision of the Constitution which allows the President to nominate and the Senate to consent, requiring the assent of both when an officer was suspended, the office became vacant; then if at a subsequent time the Senate could by an affirmative action put an officer back in office, I say that was putting executive power in the hands of the Senate without the consent of the President. Hence I maintained that it was unconstitutional. I believe it was. That was my proposition and that was my statement.

Now, sir, the conference committee, whether because that point was made or not makes no difference to me, have stricken from the bill that which was obnoxious. It relieves the bill of that portion which clearly to my mind was unconstitutional. What have they left? They have left the shadow of the substance and nothing more. Although I should prefer a bill of two lines: "Be it enacted, &c., That the civil tenure-of-office law, approved at such a date, is hereby repealed," although I would have preferred that, yet, inasmuch as the Senate have some pride of opinion, and the House have some pride of opinion, and the Republican portion of the House are divided in reference to this question, and the Senate and House had chosen a committee of members representing both sides of that question, I am willing to vote for the report which they have made. In their agreement they have done, in my judgment, what I would have done, except they have employed different language from that which I would have employed. I would have said "repealed," but they have said in a great many words what amounts to the same thing.—Congressional Globe, first session Forty-first Congress, page 405.

I beg to call your attention to the speech in the House of Representatives of Hon. Noah Davis, of New York, a Republican, March 26, 1869, which for force and a thorough understanding of the question in all its bearings is not, as I think, excelled by any speech in either House. In the course of that speech Mr. Davis said:

The President removes or suspends a faithless officer, and behold here arises in the Chamber of one of the branches of the Legislature another power to interfere with that removal. What then? According to the provisions of this act the removed officer becomes the prosecuted officer. The law appeals on his behalf to the Senate. He surrounds that body with every influence he can bring to bear, and in substance puts the President himself on trial. The officer seeks to show that the President has been unjust. The President seeks to vindicate his action, and the issue thus joined is to be tried amid the blinding passions of party prejudice.

The Senate, if of a party opposed to the President, will shield its partisans, and party allegiance will cover frauds and even crimes under the excitement of political struggles. Can we not see that in the long future of this country we are opening the door to incessant turmoil and strife? And what is there in the judgment of the Senate to make it more valuable to the country than the decision of the President? The Senate sits and acts in such cases under the seal of secrecy. What reasons govern or what motives impel its action may never be disclosed. It is free from official and as well from individual responsibility—for who can know how a majority is made up unless the Senate chooses to disclose? It is not directly responsible to the people, who can reach it only by a circuity which is little better than no popular remedy. Its true functions are legislative, and its duties in the proper discharge of those functions ought not to be interfered with by incessant strifes for the retention of office. With these new powers it will eventually become an oligarchy, acting in secret and without responsibility, feared and hated by the people, baffled as often as may be by the President, and thwarted by its co-ordinate legislative body. The laws it enacts will be tainted by the passions excited by contests over the possession of office.

There is but one sound rule on this subject, and that is to confine the executive power to a single head, as the Constitution has done, and hold that head to a strict responsibility. I have never seen this rule better expressed than is done in the constitution of Massachusetts by the hand of the elder Adams:

"In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers or either of them; the executive department shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers or either of them; the judicial department shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers or either of them; to the end that it may be a government of laws and not of men."

Our safety lies in adherence to this wise and most salutary rule which the framers of the Constitution intended to prescribe.

I know that gentlemen press upon the House the circumstances under which the civil-tenure law was enacted. I am not here to discuss those circumstances; but under the solemn sanction of the oath I took on entering this body I affirm my belief that under no condition of things can an exigency arise that will justify Congress in transferring the executive power of the President to itself or to either branch of the Legislature. It would be folly to bring that power to this House, although we, like the President, are the representatives of the people and directly responsible to them. But it would be madness to give it permanently to the other branch, and thus create an oligarchy, responsible neither to the people nor to the President nor to the courts nor to the States nor to this House, nor even to themselves."—Appendix to Congressional Globe, Forty-first Congress, first session, page 5.

Mr. President, the issue is fairly joined and presented. Upon it the two parties go to the country I believe that the President could not with self-respect, with respect to his great oath of office, with respect to his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, yield to a demand laden with mischief, as unwise as it is destructive of the admirable distribution of powers among the co-ordinate departments of the Government made by the Constitution.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, on the 17th day of July, 1885, the President of the United States, pursuant to the provisions of section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, suspended George M. Duskin from the execution of the duties of the office of district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, and on the same day, pursuant to the same statute, designated J. D. Burnett to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time, and on the 14th day of December, 1885, he nominated said Burnett to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama vice George M. Duskin, suspended.

On the 25th day of January, 1886, having failed to obtain from the Department the information necessary to enable them to act intelligently on the nomination, the Committee on the Judiciary reported to the Senate a resolution, which was adopted, and which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama.

On the 1st day of February, 1886, the Attorney-General, in response to the resolution, sent to the Senate a communication, the concluding portion of which is as follows:

It is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

This communication having been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, on the 18th day of February that committee submitted a written majority report accompanied by the following resolutions, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read the resolutions appended to the report, as follows:

Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring—"That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office" ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach and to give place to another who has not rendered such service is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not propose to discuss the question raised by these resolutions as to the right of Congress or either branch thereof, as the legislative department of the Government, to be informed as to the manner in which the laws have been executed, as to the condition of the public service and the state of the Union, and for that purpose to have access to the public documents on file in all the Departments of the Government.

Upon this question I shall content myself with saying that I fully concur in all that was so ably said by the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. But as to the question in whom under the Constitution the power of removal of Federal officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is lodged, which I suppose involves the right of the Senate to have the information which can be acquired from documents on the files of the Department which have been filed for the purpose of procuring official action and upon which official action has been had in the suspension of or is proposed in the removal of Federal officers, I have decided views to which I propose to give expression; but before doing so I desire to devote a few moments to the proposition contained in the last resolution reported by the committee.

The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, in their report referring to this resolution, say:

The minority of your committee can not close their report without expressing surprise at the appearance in the majority report of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring—

"'That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office, ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach, and to give place to another who has not rendered such service, is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.'"

The minority of your committee fully indorse section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, and heartily favor its faithful execution; but their information and belief satisfy them that under its operation during the administrations of Republican Presidents partisan and political influences and considerations have governed in a great degree in the selection of the intended beneficiaries of that statute, so that no equal and just distribution has been made by Republican Presidents among the meritorious class described in the law, as is doubtless desired alike by Republican and Democratic soldiers and marines who were comrades in a common cause.

The minority also say in that report that the reporting of this resolution by the majority of the committee is another evidence that the intent of the whole proceeding is to obtain a partisan and political advantage. I will not imitate their example and charge that their indorsement of this section of the Revised Statutes is insincere or that it is made from improper motives, but I have a right to show, if I can, that these provisions for the benefit of ex-Union soldiers, of the scarred and disabled veterans of the Union Army, have been disregarded by the present administration, although if in doing so I should prove that these champions of the executive prerogative, so called, are not in harmony with the administration.

I hold in my hand a report of the employment committee, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Potomac, adopted at the session of the encampment held at Washington, D. C., January 21, 1886, from which I quote the following:

While the employment committees of former years were principally engaged in securing employment for applicants, and with fair success, the present committee have, we regret to report, owing to conditions that will be mentioned hereafter, received but little encouragement in proportion to the amount of labor expended in this direction. Indeed, this has been an "off year" for the class we represent. The gloomy forebodings of Commander Alexander, in his address to the last department encampment, seem to have been realized. But we have the pleasure of knowing, however, that in the few cases where employment was secured much real misery was relieved and a few homes and firesides made happier.

By far the greatest amount of our labors for the last year has been expended in seeking the reinstatement of comrades discharged from their positions in the Executive Departments, and in endeavoring to secure the retention in their places of those who had employment.

As far as we can learn there have been seventy-eight comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic discharged from Government employ during the last year, also a large number of ex-Union soldiers and sailors who are not affiliated with us, and many of the wards of the Grand Army. Of those comrades who have been discharged or who have been requested to tender their resignations, this committee has been solicited to use its influence in securing a reversal of departmental action in thirty-seven cases, in which we have been successful in ten cases, and this has been effected only by constant and repeated importunity.

It may be well to state here that President Cleveland and the heads of the several Executive Departments have been exceedingly kind and courteous, and have patiently listened to our oft-repeated requests in the interest of our comrades, but the same can not be said of some holding subordinate positions.

That any ex-Union soldier or sailor holding office under the Government should have cause for anxiety about his official tenure, provided his official and personal record is good, is somewhat strange when it is remembered that Congress has passed laws, which have never been repealed, but are now in full and binding force on those having the execution of them, and which not only prefer such for appointment, but also protect those who are in Government employ from discharge. It is also somewhat humiliating that we must knock at the doors and beg for that recognition which is not only ours by right, but is acknowledged both by statute and by public sentiment.

In the present instance it is known that the discharge of our comrades has not been occasioned by a reduction of the force, nor is it believed to have been caused, except in rare instances, by any supposed inefficiency or personal dereliction, for it is doubtful that those who saved a nation are skulkers, shirks, and bummers in these "piping times of peace." Nor can it be said that the civil-service act was ever intended to place an obstruction in the way of those holding office at the time of, or at any time since, its passage, provided always that the office-holder was capable, efficient, and honest.

The law upon the statute-books seems to be ample to carry out the full intent and meaning of the legislators, and yet it has been repeatedly violated. Before the war closed, in which we were all participants in a greater or less degree, Congress passed the following act, which was approved by President Lincoln March 3, 1865:

"Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty, shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices." (Section 1754, Revised Statutes.)

In 1876, much of the work of the Departments incident to the war having been settled, the appropriations for the years 1876-'77 were considerably reduced, requiring some reduction in the clerical, messenger, and laboring force, but that ex-Union soldiers and sailors might not be discriminated against, the following law was passed, which was approved by our comrade and late commander, President Grant:

"Provided, That in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments, the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors." (Section 3, chapter 287, Laws 1876.)

It is estimated that of the total number of employés in the Departments in Washington the soldier element is about 30 per cent., and it is believed that nearly 40 per cent. of all who have been discharged come from that class—there is certainly a large percentage against us. It almost, indeed, amounts, in some places, to ostracism and a practical nullification of law.

Now, if our comrades have not been removed from their positions on account of inefficiency, nor by reason of a reduction of force, what then is the reason? Is it to make places for others? While this may be true with regard to those holding places in the unclassified service of the Departments, it should not be applied to those of our comrades who were in the classified service, for the vacancies made by their removal can be filled only in a manner prescribed by law, namely, a civil-service examination, and therefore the desired end could not be attained in that way. The reason, then, for such removals must be sought for elsewhere. But whatever the reason may be, provided it is not for incompetency, the question naturally arises, why is it that the class we represent should ever be made the special object for removal; who is responsible, and what is the remedy?

Heretofore, while there may have been some reason to find fault with the appointing power in failing to appoint, there has been but little opportunity to criticise for failure to retain our comrades in office. Provided a comrade had a good personal and official record, he felt tolerably secure in his position, and that without regard to party affiliation. It was believed, and the belief was put into practical effect, that even though an ex-Union soldier was so offensively partisan as to cast his vote against the dominant party, yet such an act on his part did not operate as a bar to his holding an office under the Federal Government, nor outweigh the good he had done the Union in fighting her battles at a time when offensive and defensive partisanship, on the right side, was at a premium. Then what great unpardonable political sin have our comrades at this late date committed to render them obnoxious to some of those in power and cause a boycott to be placed upon them? Nor is this the worst feature of the case, bad as it may be. Not satisfied with looking with disfavor upon the "boys in blue," it has sometimes seemed as if the "boys in gray" were to be recognized as prodigal sons returning from their wanderings for whom the fatted calf was to be especially devoted. We have seen a comrade whose army record was of the very best, and whose civil-service record was irreproachable, degraded from a high position that he won by meritorious service and his place filled by one who was in armed rebellion against the Government.

It is with much regret that we feel obliged to refer to such matters, but a strong sense of duty toward our comrades and this encampment compels us to state the facts as we find them. We have never questioned an applicant for appointment, reinstatement, or retention with relation to his party affiliation. All we asked was that he should come to us with an indorsement from his post employment committee that he was in good standing in his post and bore a good reputation for intelligence, honesty, and industry.

A remark has been made by one holding a prominent position in one of the Executive Departments that "the soldier business is played out." Perhaps it is with some people who were too cowardly to risk their precious bodies to the shot and shell of rebellion, and the deprivations, sickness, and arduous duties incident to Army life, but preferred to remain behind and furnish moldy hardtack, rotten beef, shoddy clothing, and chicory coffee to those who were fighting their battles.

I have no means of knowing how many of the six hundred and forty-three persons who were suspended from office by the President during the recess of the Senate were ex-soldiers of the Union or disabled soldiers, but I know there were a great many. Several cases have come under my observation of one-armed and one-legged veterans whose families were left in destitution when they were suspended from the duties of their offices, and other persons who had performed no military service to the Government were designated to perform the duties and receive the emoluments of the office, and this report just read discloses a state of affairs in the various Executive Departments of the Government here which if the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary are sincere in their indorsement of the section of the Revised Statutes in question they can not approve of.

Who are these persons who are discriminated against in the Departments? Not all of them able-bodied ex-Union soldiers, but some are disabled soldiers who were honorably discharged from military service on account of disability by reasons of wounds and sickness incurred in the line of their duty, men who on the march, upon the battlefield, and in rebel prisons suffered for the cause of the Union. These statutes which have been referred to are a practical recognition by the Government of the obligation of the nation to the men who participated in the great conflict, and who by their glorious deeds and heroic sacrifices carried our flag to victory and saved the Union.

Neither the Grand Army of the Republic nor the ex-Union soldiers nor the people generally will be deceived by any indorsement of this statute when it comes to be known, as it must shortly be, that in the indiscriminate suspensions which have been made by the Chief Executive during the recess of the Senate these war-scarred disabled veterans have formed no exception, and that in the Departments they are discriminated against to such an extent that, in the language of the committee which I have read, it amounts in some places almost to ostracism and to a practical nullification of the law.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will it interfere with the Senator if I should ask him a question right there? I will not do so if he prefers not to answer me.

Mr. DOLPH. I prefer to answer any question when I close my remarks.

Mr. McPHERSON. It is one pertinent to the remarks now being made by the Senator. That was the reason I interposed.

Mr. DOLPH. At the close of my remarks I shall be glad to answer any question I am able to respond to, but just at this time I prefer to proceed in the order which I have blocked out for my remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Senator from Oregon would prefer not to go on further to-night. It has now got to be 5 o'clock, and I think we may possibly adjourn without impropriety; but I hope the Senate to-morrow will sit still later, so as to get on and finish the question pending. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES MINT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Director of the Mint, and asking that the salaries of the examiner of mints and the computer of bullion be increased to $2,500 per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS LEFT HAND RIVER, MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from the Chief of Engineers and Major Charles H. Allen, Corps of Engineers, in relation to the construction of a bridge across the Left Hand (Nemadji) River by Douglass County, Minnesota, and referring to the necessity of legislation by Congress assuming control of the subject, in order to prevent obstruction of navigation; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1885, lists of Indian depredation claims filed in the Indian Bureau and remaining unpaid; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRES ALAMOS LAND CLAIM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office relative to the private land claim "Tres Alamos," Arizona Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ELIZABETH MULVEHILL VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order and findings of fact by that court in the case of Elizabeth Mulvehill against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WADE, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, for one week.

To Mr. PLUMB, for ten days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. GROSVENOR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. GLOVER, until Tuesday next.

To Mr. HOUK, for five days, on account of important business.

REMOVAL OF MATERIAL FROM GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up from the House Calendar the bill H. R. 4982 and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 16, 1883.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] whether this will lead to debate?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Not at all, sir. It is only necessary to have a letter from the Public Printer read to show the necessity of this legislation, and I am sure there can be no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object if the bill will not lead to debate and occupy time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must either object or not object.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I trust there will be no objection to the consideration of this bill. It is really necessary for expediting the public business.

There was no objection.

The Committee on Printing recommended the amendment of the bill as follows: In line 7, strike out the words "four thousand" and insert the words "fourteen thousand five hundred;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883, the sum of $14,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

JEFFERSONVILLE LEVEE APPROPRIATION.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will state it by presenting the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, as a question of privilege, offers the resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there was pending in the Forty-eighth Congress a bill containing, among other matters, an appropriation of $50,000 for a certain improvement of the Ohio River at or near Jeffersonville, Ind., known as the Jeffersonville levee appropriation; and

Whereas it is charged by a reputable citizen of Indiana that during the pendency of said measure a person or persons, then officers of the House of Representatives, exacted, collected, and accepted from a person or persons interested in the success of the said appropriation a large sum of money upon the pretense or for the purpose of influencing Congress, or some committee thereof, or members or Senators in their official action thereon; and

Whereas it is also charged that the person or persons so exacting, collecting, and accepting said sum of money for the purpose aforesaid are officers and employés of this House: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the truth of said charges and report the facts to this House; and to enable the said committee to thoroughly investigate said charges it is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers; and a sum sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of this inquiry is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the order made yesterday the Chair will proceed to call the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions. Under this call petitions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order, and also resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Departments.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. OATES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That from and after the adoption of the resolution the Speaker shall not entertain nor put to a vote any motion, resolution, or proposition to appoint a committee or designate any member of the House to accompany the remains of any deceased Representative or Senator to any point beyond the corporate limits of the city of Washington, D. C.

AMERICAN PORK IN EUROPE.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to transmit, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of all correspondence between his Department and the representatives of France, Germany, Austria, and any other European country which has partially or entirely restricted the importation of American pork, referring to the facts of such exclusion or restriction and the reasons therefor.

Mr. PHELPS. I also send to the Clerk's desk a memorial of the State board of agriculture of New Jersey, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD. It concerns an important subject—the exclusion of American pork from some of the markets in Europe. It will not occupy more than twenty-five lines.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in National Congress assembled:

Whereas the extreme low price of pork (which is one of the largest crops of the American farmer) is seriously affecting the profits of agriculture in this country; and

Whereas the President, in his recent message to Congress, says: "I regret to say that the restrictions upon the importation of our pork into France continue, notwithstanding the abundant demonstration of the absence of sanitary danger in its use, but I entertain strong hopes that, with a better understanding of the matter, this vexatious prohibition will be removed. It would be pleasing to be able to say as much with respect to Germany, Austria, and other countries where such food products are absolutely excluded without present prospect of reasonable change;" and

Whereas the President does not in his message give the information as to the reasons or cause why American pork is absolutely excluded in Germany, Austria, and other countries: Therefore,

Resolved, That the State board of agriculture of New Jersey do hereby request our representatives in Congress to make diligent investigation into this matter, and endeavor to secure such changes as may be necessary to relieve this important industry from the restrictions now imposed upon it by other countries.

By order of the New Jersey State board of agriculture.

E. BURROUGH, President.

Attest:

WM. S. TAYLOR, Secretary.

BLAIR EDUCATIONAL BILL.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolution instructing the Committee on Education to report Senate bill 194, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," and commonly known as the Blair bill.

Whereas during the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, in the month of April, 1884, the Senate passed and sent to the House of Representatives for its concurrence a bill similar to the one referred to in the title above mentioned, which said bill was never acted upon by the House of Representatives during the said session, nor at the second session of said Congress; and

Whereas the Senate has recently passed said Senate bill 194, and sent it to the House of Representatives, requesting concurrence therein; and

Whereas it is reported that the House Committee on Education has postponed the consideration of said bill until the third Monday of April next, a time when the session may be too far advanced and the Calendar of the House too much crowded to secure a proper consideration of said bill; and

Whereas the Legislature of the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Kentucky have requested their Representatives and instructed their Senators in Congress to aid in securing temporary Federal aid to the common schools of the several States; and

Whereas the State superintendents of public instruction for the States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky, appointed as a committee to represent the educational convention assembled from said States at Atlanta, Ga., have heretofore memorialized Congress, setting forth the immediate and pressing educational wants of the Southern States of the Union and praying for speedy action in aid thereof; and

Whereas the passage of said bill would enable the States hereinbefore mentioned to extend the blessings and advantages of a common-school training to all indigent and illiterate children resident therein, more especially to the children of citizens who are compelled to labor for low wages in the shops or on the farms, and have not the means requisite to provide an elementary education; and

Whereas it is undemocratic, unrepublican, unjust, and unfair, as well to the constituents of members of this House who represent the States above named as to the poor children of the whole Union, more especially to those residing in the South, who are without the necessary facilities of a common-school education, to prevent action on said bill by unusual delay in reporting on the same, and not allowing a full and fair discussion and consideration thereof by the House: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Education, to whom was referred said Senate bill 194, be directed to report the same to the House forthwith with such recommendations as to said committee may seem proper.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 6661) to provide for closing up the business and paying the expenses of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting and disbursing officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to audit and pay the compensation not already paid of assistant counsel on behalf of the United States, subordinate clerks, accountants, computants, expert examiners and assistant examiners, janitors, messengers, watchmen, and scrub-women employed by the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims prior to the 1st day of January, 1886, at the rate of compensation fixed by said court, and in accordance with vouchers approved by said court and certified by the presiding judge thereof, and also to audit and pay all other necessary expenses of said court up to the day last mentioned, approved and certified in the manner aforesaid, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be reimbursed out of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award fund.

SEC. 2. That the said accounting officers are hereby also directed to allow to Andrew H. Allen, in the settlement of his accounts with the Treasury Department under his appointment as disbursing agent, made by the Secretary of State on July 20, 1882, all sums of money which he may have paid, covered by vouchers approved and certified as described in the preceding section, and also compensation for his services as such disbursing agent, at the rate fixed by the Secretary of State in his letter of May 2, 1883, up to the 1st day of January, 1886, so far as he has not already been paid.

SEC. 3. That the powers of the clerk of said court are hereby extended for an additional period, not to exceed six months from and after the termination of said court, on the 31st day of December, 1885, for the purpose of closing up the business of his office, and for depositing the records, documents, and all other papers of the court or its officers in the office of the Secretary of State, as provided in the act re-establishing said court, and the act therein referred to; and said clerk is hereby authorized to employ such assistance as he may deem necessary for the purpose of enabling him to carry into effect the provisions of this act, not to extend in number those heretofore employed, said assistants to be paid monthly, at the same rate of compensation heretofore paid them, from and after said 31st day of December, 1885, on vouchers certified by said clerk, under the direction of the Secretary of State, from said Geneva award fund; and all disbursements shall be made by said clerk, under the direction of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is hereby authorized and directed to make sale of all furniture and other property in and about the building used and occupied by the said court, and which were procured for the use of the court and the officers and employés thereof, at such time and place and in such manner as he shall deem most advantageous to the Government, and to cover the proceeds of such sale into the Treasury.

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of State, with the assistance of the clerk of the said court, to immediately after the passage of this act make an estimate of the cost and expenses for the salary and pay of the clerk and employés under him, and all other necessary incidental expenses, for and during the time from said 31st day of December, 1885, not to exceed six months as aforesaid, as shall be judged necessary, as aforesaid, for completing the journals, records, and other entries and business of said court required to be completed, and for putting in order, arranging, and delivering to the Secretary of State all said records, journals, documents, papers, and other property lately appertaining to said court and which are hereinabove named: Provided, however, That the said expenses provided for in this section to be estimated as aforesaid shall not exceed the sum of $15,000; and that any sum which may remain of the amount so estimated and deducted from the said fund for the purpose named in this section shall be by the Secretary of State covered into the Treasury of the United States; and the said Secretary of State shall further make an estimate of the net amount which will probably be realized and covered into the Treasury from the sale of the furniture and property hereinbefore named.

SEC. 5. That the amount which shall be paid out and distributed in payment and satisfaction of the judgments of the first and second class which are now existing as rendered by the said court against the Geneva award fund, and in payment of the expenses, salaries, and other outlays contemplated and provided for in this act, and in the act re-establishing the said court, approved June 5, 1882, shall be ascertained in the following manner: To the sum of $9,703,904.89, this being the amount of the said Geneva award fund remaining in the Treasury, as disclosed by the Treasury report of June 30, 1877, and the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives dated April 22, 1884, shall be added the premium realized from the sale of certain bonds in which the said fund was invested, namely, the sum of $385,100.07, making $10,089,004.96; and to this sum shall further be added the estimated value of the said furniture and property, as provided for in section 4 of this act; and from the aggregate sum so ascertained shall be subtracted the estimated cost of the services and expenses provided for being estimated in section 4 of this act, and also the amount provided for in section 1 of this act, together with all the other expenses of the court; and from the amount so ascertained shall be further deducted the aggregate of the judgments of the first class which have already been paid, and the balance shall be applied as follows: First, to the payment of the judgments of the first class yet remaining unpaid as provided in said act, approved June 5, 1882, and the residue shall be paid out and distributed pro rata upon the judgments in favor of claimants of the second class, as provided in said last named act. And the amounts so ascertained as aforesaid are, for the purpose of making the payment aforesaid, hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. I hope a second will be considered as ordered by consent.

There was no objection, and a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes for and fifteen against the bill. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in opposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not desire to debate the bill, but simply asked time so that an explanation might be given.

Mr. COLLINS. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that after a brief explanation of the terms of this bill there will be any opposition whatever to its passage. Its sole purpose is to close up the business and make as speedy payment as possible of the funds committed to the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims; and its passage is necessary for the purpose of that speedy payment, as well as for the settlement of some disputes which have arisen between the owners of this fund and the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The fund stood in the United States Treasury on the 30th of June, 1877, at $10,089,004.96; that is the fund available for the distribution. From that date until the passage of the act of 1882 there was a very sharp contest among the different classes of claimants in and out of Congress for the distribution of that fund.

The act of 1882 finally settled the policy of Congress on that point and formed a new court or commission for the distribution of the fund to two classes of claimants. That court, on the 31st of last December, finished its judicial work. The first-class claimants will be paid in full. The second-class claimants will receive about 54 per cent. of the claims approved.

It seemed to the committee, after looking over some six bills presented for their consideration, to be necessary and only necessary to accomplish three things by this bill, which was reported in lieu of all the others. First, to give sufficient time for the clerical work to be finished, which, we were satisfied, could not be done under the provisions of the act of 1884 which limited it to the 30th day of May of the present year. Therefore this bill provides that an additional period, not exceeding two months, shall be given for finishing the clerical work of the court and transmitting its property and papers in good order to the State Department.

In the second place, under the provisions of the acts of 1882 and 1884 subordinate officers found necessary to be employed by the court were not provided for. The court assumed the responsibility of employing a sufficient force to do the business, and the amount for their payment until last September was favorably passed upon by all the accounting officers by the Secretary of State and by the Department of Justice. From the time that their accounts were suspended down to the time that the court ceased its judicial work they were paid by counsel representing the vast majority of the creditors of the fund, who decided in behalf of all the creditors that these subordinate officers were necessary, that their compensation was reasonable, and that the court could not finish its business without employing them.

We provide in the third place for immediately ascertaining what that fund shall be; we provide the Secretary of State shall appraise the value of the property on hand and add it to the fund, subtracting $15,000 to pay for closing up the court for a period not exceeding six months, and that the balance shall be immediately available for distribution among those who shall have proved their claims. The creditors of the fund are unanimous in desiring to have these payments made. They make them out of their own pockets. It costs the United States nothing. And the Committee on the Judiciary were unanimous in deciding that this bill was necessary, and that no other bills were necessary in order to reopen the vexed question as to who should have title to this fund. The claims have all been approved under sanction of Congress at the expense of the litigants; and we believe that this Congress should close the long chapter which began at Geneva and should end here.

Mr. TUCKER. An administration de bonis non.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand this bill makes no appropriation out of the Treasury outside of the fund itself?

Mr. COLLINS. Not one cent.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the verbal amendments appearing upon the face of the bill, two words having been corrected.

The question having been taken, two-thirds voted in the affirmative; and the bill was passed.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The Committee on Banking and Currency was called.

Mr. MILLER. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the receiver of any national bank duly appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, and who shall have duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his trust, shall find it in his opinion necessary, in order to fully protect and benefit his said trust, to the extent of any and all equities that such trust may have in any property, real or personal, by reason of any bond, mortgage, assignment, or other proper legal claim attaching thereto, and which said property is to be sold under any execution, decree of foreclosure, or proper order of any court of jurisdiction, he may certify the facts in the case, together with his opinion as to the value of the property to be so sold, and the value of the equity his said trust may have in the same, to the Comptroller of the Currency, together with a request for the right and authority to use and employ so much of the money of said trust as may be necessary to purchase such property at such sale.

SEC. 2. That such request, if approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be, together with the certificate of facts in the case, and his recommendation as to the amount of money which, in his judgment, should be so used and employed, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if the same shall likewise be approved by him, the request shall be by the Comptroller of the Currency allowed, and notice thereof, with copies of the request, certificate of facts, and indorsement of approvals, shall be filed with the Treasurer of the United States.

SEC. 3. That whenever any such request shall be allowed as hereinbefore provided, the said Comptroller of the Currency shall be, and is, empowered to draw upon and from such funds of any such trust as may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for the benefit of the bank in interest, to the amount as may be recommended and allowed and for the purpose for which such allowance was made: Provided, however, That all payments to be made for or on account of the purchase of any such property and under any such allowance shall be made by the Comptroller of the Currency direct, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for such purpose only and in such manner as he may determine and order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? Unless a second is demanded and ordered by the House no debate is in order.

Mr. PETERS. I demand a second.

There being no objection, the second was considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. MILLER. The act of Congress organizing national banks provides that where a bank has bona fide debts it may take liens on real estate or personal property to secure those debts. The bank itself while in existence has power to buy in this property at judicial sale or private sale, or any other, but the receiver of a national bank has no such power. He represents the creditors, and there is no law of Congress authorizing the receiver after he has foreclosed the lien to buy in property so as to prevent loss to the creditors of the bank; because the receiver represents the creditors of the bank, and not the bank itself. There can not be a receiver of a national bank until it has gone into liquidation. This bill authorizes a receiver when he has a judgment against real estate or personal property, and when a decree of foreclosure has been made, so that there is a judicial sale of the property, to apply to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the amount of the lien on the property and the value of the property, and to get authority from the Secretary of the Treasury to bid so much upon the property at the judicial sale so as to prevent it from being sacrificed.

Mr. MILLS. In whose name is he to buy it?

Mr. MILLER. It is to be bought in the name of the receiver of the bank.

Mr. MILLS. And he has to sell it again for distribution?

Mr. MILLER. Just as he disposes of all other property belonging to the bank.

Mr. BEACH. The bill is in the interest of the creditors?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. Then it takes two sales under this bill to make a distribution of the proceeds among the creditors.

Mr. MILLER. Yes. The trouble has been heretofore that the property has been sacrificed and the creditor can not get any benefit unless he is given a right to make a bid. This will permit him to bid, and that will protect his lien. He may not buy the property at all, because he is limited in the amount of his bid. Further, in order to prevent collusion between the receiver and anybody else, the law provides that the Comptroller of the Currency shall draw the money and pay it out in case there is a purchase under this bill, so that the interests of the public are perfectly protected. This legislation is in the interest of the creditor, and I think there can be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill was not very distinctly heard when it was read, nor has the explanation made by the gentleman from Texas been distinctly heard throughout the House, and therefore I ask that the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read for information.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this bill, it simply gives receivers of banks the same power in reference to the purchase of any equities that may exist upon real estate or upon personal property that the directors of the bank have; only it must be exercised with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is simply to protect the trust?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further debate, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLER] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. COBB. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 111, noes 9.

So the motion was agreed to, and the bill was passed.

CONSIDERATION OF SILVER COINAGE BILL.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the desk to be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 5690, for the free coinage of silver, be made the special order for Saturdays, March 20 and March 27 instant, also Saturday the 3d of April next, and that the same be again taken up on Tuesday, April 6, after the morning hour, for the consideration of bills reported by committees, and so to continue from day to day until disposed of: Provided, That, unless sooner ordered by the House, the previous question shall be pending thereon at 3 o'clock Thursday, April 8. This order not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills, except on said Thursday, April 8 next, for the final disposition of this order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me at this time to request the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to consent to a modification of his resolution by striking out the last part of it, so that the time when the previous question shall be ordered may be left undetermined until we have had two or three days' discussion, and know that all gentlemen who desire have had an opportunity to express their views on the subject?

Mr. BLAND. I think, Mr. Speaker, the time had better be fixed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 28.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to control the time in support of the resolution, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the House will notice that the order proposed to be made is simply to use Saturday, a day which, so far, under a special order of the House, has been generally devoted to the discussion of this subject. It is proposed now to use for the consideration of this bill three successive Saturdays—next Saturday, Saturday week, and Saturday two weeks; then that the bill shall be taken up again on Tuesday, April 6, after the hour for the consideration of bills reported from committees; that the discussion shall continue on Wednesday and Thursday, April 7 and 8, and that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at 3 o'clock on Thursday. This gives three Saturdays for the consideration of the bill and a part of three other days after the consideration of bills in the morning hour. This arrangement ought not to interfere, I think, with general appropriation or revenue bills except on the last day. I do not see how there can be any objection to discussing this question on some proposition pending before the House, instead of in the irregular and desultory manner in which it has been discussed so far this session.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss the merits of the bill which it is proposed to consider. That bill has been reported to the House adversely, and this resolution asks this House to consider that adverse report. I can see no good that can come of the discussion. I recognize the fact that at least a majority of this House is opposed to the suspension of silver coinage; I do not believe that a majority of this House is in favor of unlimited silver coinage; and I perhaps may as well say that one of the purposes I had in view in demanding a second on this proposition was to get, if I could, a test vote on that question. If gentlemen believe that silver coinage should be suspended, for them there is no profit in this discussion, for they must recognize the fact that in view of the well-understood sentiment of the House the present silver-coinage law will not be repealed by this House. If gentlemen are in favor of having the law remain as it is, then there is no profit in this discussion. It is only in the direction of free and unlimited coinage that there can be any reason for this discussion whatever.

I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the second on this resolution for reasons directly opposed to those stated by my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. I think that this subject should be discussed by Congress; that the views of different members should be given to the country; that we should be made to understand the question thoroughly ourselves, and so far as our discussions may tend to enlighten those who have not the same opportunities that we have, they should be spread all over the country.

I am in favor of the suspension of the coinage of silver. I am absolutely and utterly opposed to the free coinage of silver. I believe that a discussion of this subject will enable members to present such facts, such statements, such arguments drawn from experience and from the logic of past events as must convince the mind of any man who will scrutinize this subject closely that the free coinage of silver would be the greatest calamity that could befall the country, and that even the continued coinage of the present debased or clipped currency under existing law is an injury to the country which Congress must soon repair, or it must bear the brunt of having inflicted that injury on the country by non-action.

I am therefore in favor of the six days' discussion proposed by this resolution; and I was desirous of proposing to my friend [Mr. BLAND] that those six days of discussion should not be interrupted by the intervention of any general appropriation bill or revenue bill or any other measure that would prevent the House from devoting the entire six days to the discussion of this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, for the reason that I believe at this time no legislation on this subject is good legislation. I have no sympathy with a considerable class of people in this country who want gold exclusively for currency because it is the dearer, nor have I sympathy with the class at the other extreme who want silver to the exclusion of gold because it is the cheaper. I believe there is a wise course between the two that four out of five persons in all sections of this country want to see pursued.

The two hundred million of silver dollars, 20 per cent. less in value intrinsically than an equal number of gold dollars, do circulate side by side at par with gold, the Government making the profit, the seigniorage being about 20 cents on the dollar, or $5,000,000 a year on the amount we are now coining. I believe that for some years to come we can continue the coinage of silver, the Government getting the seigniorage or profit, and that this silver will circulate side by side with gold. In the mean time, as these years are passing by, opportunity is given to our Government to make an international agreement with other Governments as to what the ratio shall be as between the two metals. And I believe that we shall be able to do it, so that this matter shall be set at rest forever.

I am not willing to favor free coinage of silver at this time, instead of following the conservative path that we are now upon, the Government taking the seigniorage or profit on this coinage. Free coinage means a profit of 20 cents on each dollar coined; $20,000,000 on each $100,000,000 coined shall go into the pockets of the bullion-holder or the speculator instead of going into the Treasury of the United States, and I fear and believe it would mean a single silver standard in a very short time. I say again I want the unit to rest upon both metals, and rest there permanently.

I can see no good that this discussion will beget. Gentlemen who are vain enough to think they have a monopoly of information on this question are mistaken. I believe the country fully understands the question, and that it is the part of wisdom for us to devote ourselves to legitimate business upon which we can legislate. We can not legislate on this question. There is revenue legislation coming up for consideration. The appropriation bills are to pass. A bill touching interstate commerce and for the control of railways is pressing for consideration. I might mention various other matters. In the mean time spring is advancing and the hot weather is soon to be on us. I want to be practical; and because I want to be practical, because I want to consider these important matters that we ought to consider and can consider, I am not willing to set aside several days in the most valuable part of this session to the consideration of a bill that is reported adversely from the committee and has no possible chance of being enacted into law.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures instructed their chairman to offer the resolution which he has submitted; but as my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] seems to desire to make this a test vote as to the question of free coinage, I wish to say in behalf of the majority of the committee who made this report that, considering this a test vote, we shall be obliged to vote against the resolution. I realize the importance of the consideration and discussion of this question, for I know that the business interests of the country are suffering very much from the delay; but we shall get the time in due course in the regular way on the call of the committee. With the understanding that this is a test vote I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that entertaining on this general question the views that he does—recognizing as he must (and I may say that I sympathize with him) the fact that this agitation, if it results in anything, is to result in the unlimited coinage of silver, I can see no reason why the agitation should be kept alive, the business interests of the country being disturbed by it, while we resolve ourselves into a debating society upon the adverse report made by a committee of this House.

What time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will reserve that time.

Mr. BLAND. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. BLAND. I will yield two minutes of that time to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PETERS. I am one of those in favor of turning the light upon this question. I do not believe the advocates of silver are afraid of discussion. The whole scope of the resolution which has been offered by the gentleman from Missouri is to give to the discussion of this measure the right of way before this House, so that those who are in favor of it can present their arguments in favor of it and those opposed to it can present their arguments against the proposition involved in what is called the silver question. We have made some advance thus far in this matter. At the beginning of this session the feeling of this House on this question was mere conjecture. Now it is conceded by those who favor the suspension of silver coinage that no such proposition can pass through this House. I feel that still further discussion on the question may even bring them to admit the fact that not only will there be no suspension of silver coinage, but that coinage will be made free so far as the sentiment of this House is concerned.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] say that no good can come out of this discussion; that we can accomplish nothing. I say, Mr. Speaker, the molding of the sentiment of this House is the molding of the sentiment of the people, and the sentiment as it has thus far been indicated is in sympathy with the feelings of the majority of the people of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I will now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the consideration of the bill mainly for the reasons offered by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. Like him, I am in favor of a free and open discussion of this question. I am confident, however, that, instead of gain being made in the direction he suggests, it is likely to be entirely in the other direction. I believe, sir, we are moving toward free coinage in this country. I do not pledge myself to vote for this bill. I concede frankly that for absolute and unlimited free coinage I am not prepared to take that step at this time. But I want to go in that direction; I want to go further than we have yet gone, and because I believe discussion will move us in that direction, in the direction the people are going, in the direction the people want their representatives to go, is the reason why I am anxious this discussion should go on. I am not afraid of it. I believe bimetallism and unlimited coinage of both metals in this country are gaining ground daily. It is the right side for the people. The prosperity of this Republic depends upon the use of silver the same as gold for money.

The demonetization of silver, to my mind, would be the death-knell to the present prosperity we enjoy over other nations. I differ with my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], because I do not believe we can discuss the question too much. The people are intensely interested in this question. No subject can be discussed which will interest them as this does. All the light we can get from the vantage-ground we hold as their representatives they have a right to demand at our hands. It is not proposed to consume very much time in discussing it. Because I have every confidence in the justice of the cause of ultimate free coinage of silver I believe I am for the fullest investigation. By all means let the discussion proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I will yield now for two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I think all attempts to discuss free coinage or unrestricted coinage are vain under the rules determining the length of debate at the present time. The single question for our consideration is the propriety of setting a time for the consideration of this bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] twice, in the limited time allotted to him upon his side of the House, said the only thing which could come from the discussion would be unlimited coinage. Is it right to have this matter discussed? It is the one great question of the world, and it is a question that ought to have and must have ample time for consideration. That is all the friends of this resolution ask. It is a subject occupying to-day the attention of the American people to a greater degree perhaps than any other question now before this country.

It is due to them, Mr. Speaker, it is due to the majority of this House, that there shall be ample opportunity to discuss a question of such vital importance and magnitude. I repeat that is all we ask, and when that is done we will take the chances on the vote in this House.

I will yield now one minute, if I have that time remaining, to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WARNER.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of free coinage or of no coinage——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has exhausted the two minutes yielded to him.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I did not understand that I had occupied the entire time.

Mr. BLAND. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is long enough to say that the proposition presented here is not as between free coinage and no coinage, nor is it a question of the suspension of coinage or continuing the coinage of silver; but it is whether this House will give this time to the consideration of the most important question now before the world.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the whole question. When that subject is before the House, when the discussion of the bill has commenced, when the bill is presented here for consideration, it may be amended, it may be modified, any other proposition may be substituted in its place; and the only question now with which we have to deal is whether the House will give this time to consider this great subject or not.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time. How much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then we will vote on the resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to make a parliamentary inquiry: Whether or not, occupying the affirmative of this proposition, I have the close of the discussion?

The SPEAKER. There is no rule of the House on that question where a motion to suspend the rules, as in this case, is pending.

Mr. BLAND. Then I will proceed.

As has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], this is not a question of free coinage or the suspension of coinage. It is whether or not the House proposes to stultify itself before the great American people on this question. This House, by an order setting apart every Saturday, for the past month has been discussing this measure, and this only. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] say that we are to discuss this question here during this Congress and yet not have the manhood or the courage to go on record before our constituents upon the subject? It will not be done. The gentleman——

Mr. BAYNE. I voted for the resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I understood that you—or possibly it was the gentleman from Illinois who occupied that position.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I am ready to vote at any time.

Mr. BLAND. I hope I will not misrepresent any gentleman.

Now, as I said before, gentlemen can not escape going upon the record upon this question, nor can you escape the consideration of the question during this Congress. This resolution is simply to curtail the time by fixing a period when this measure may be properly debated and amended and a vote be taken upon it. It would come up in its regular order anyhow in the course of two or three weeks. Do you gentlemen want to see this question antagonize your appropriation bills, your commerce bills, your unfinished bills, or the Calendars of the House? Do you wish the House to be here all summer discussing whether this or some other bill shall be considered? For I want you to remember that you will have it so unless you will consent to fix a time when this measure may be properly considered and considered in the House. So far as I am concerned, and I believe a majority of the House are of the same opinion, we are in favor of going on record on this measure. The very fact, Mr. Speaker, that it has been discussed in order and out of order, that it is being discussed now in this House and before the American people above all other questions, is a clear intimation of the fact that the House will simply stultify itself by refusing; and every member here who goes to his constituents must apologize for not having the manhood and the courage to meet this question and consider it. I do not want to go to my constituents in any such way, and I do not propose to. We must discuss it.

Gentlemen talk of the policy of foreign governments. We are a nation of sixty millions of people and are supposed to be independent. We are supposed to have manhood and courage enough to adopt a policy of our own without waiting for the step-motherly care of the Queen of Great Britain or the fatherly care of Bismarck.

I am somewhat astonished at my friend on the Committee on Coinage from New York [Mr. JAMES]. He is in here with the majority report, but now is retreating from his own report. I had supposed, in the organization of this House, that this was the most important question that would be considered before Congress, a question paramount to all other questions; and we come in here with a bill, and my friend has the majority of the committee, yet he seems afraid to trust the House upon that majority report.

We of the minority desire to overturn that majority and show to the country that this House is not in favor of suspension, but on the contrary is looking for a further coinage of silver, even though it may be free coinage. What time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. BLAND. I reserve that time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I recognize the fact that the gentleman from Missouri will present this question to the House at all seasons, at least when it is proper, and I want the gentleman to fully appreciate that I, at least, am always willing to go on record and allow my vote to express my views. The reason why I oppose this resolution I will repeat.

There can but one affirmative outcome result from this discussion, and that is the free and unlimited coinage of silver. This bill is in here on an adverse report.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Can not the bill be amended if brought before the House for action?

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman asks me if the bill can not be amended. Does he believe it will be amended so as to restrict or limit coinage? Certainly not. The only result of it, if any affirmative result comes from it, will be the free, unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You give up the fight entirely.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have made my opposition to that here, as I intend to do on all proper occasions.

Mr. BLAND. I yield what remains of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. No question has agitated the country during the last year more than the silver question. The resolution now before the House simply asks that a day be fixed by the order of the House for a discussion of that question. The people expect us to discuss it; they are discussing it; all the world is discussing this question, and I desire that this House shall fix a day for its discussion, to be followed by a day of voting, as distinguished by the discussion on Saturday, when there is no vote contemplated.

The people have asked a decision upon this question. Congress is expected to decide it, and we must decide it one way or the other. That decision can only be brought about by the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. It does not involve the question of suspension of coinage or of unlimited coinage, but it involves the question of allowing the people's representatives to be heard upon this subject, and also to vote upon it before we adjourn. Therefore I am in favor of the resolution and hope it will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which he has submitted.

Several members called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COMPTON. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 178) for the relief of Ida S. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson and Coroline Augusta Urquhart; and

A bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond.

CONSIDERATION OF COINAGE QUESTION.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 87, not voting 57; as follows:

So the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof), and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. VAN SCHAICK. I should have voted "ay" and he would have voted "no."

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I change my vote from "no" to "ay."

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I change my vote from "no" to "ay."

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I have been absent on committee work by order of the House. If I had been present, I would have voted "ay."

Pairs were announced as follows:

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. FLEEGER, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. MCKENNA, until further notice.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN, until further notice.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MILLIKEN, until further notice.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, with Mr. COMSTOCK, until further notice.

Mr. BYNUM with Mr. WAKEFIELD, until further notice.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. PLUMB, for this day.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. COOPER, for this day.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. ELY, for this day.

Mr. HALSELL with Mr. WADSWORTH, on this vote. Mr. HALSELL would vote "ay," Mr. WADSWORTH, "no."

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. HEISTAND, for this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 5445) to increase the pension of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors; and

A bill (H. R. 5219) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1210) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make sales of certain lands of the Umatilla Indian reservation to William S. Byers and others and to issue patent therefor.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under instruction of the Committee on Commerce, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be suspended, and that Tuesday the 13th day of April be fixed for the consideration of House bill 902, to regulate interstate commerce and to prevent unjust discrimination by common carriers, and that its consideration be continued from day to day until finally disposed of, not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills, and that said bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded, and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to act as tellers.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none. Thirty minutes will be allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes against it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to control the time in opposition to the resolution, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to control the time in support of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, if any gentleman on this side of the House desires time to speak on this question I am willing to yield it, but in the mean time let the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the object of the committee in offering this resolution is to secure the setting of a day for the consideration of the bill now before the House, and it may be proper to say that this resolution speaks the unanimous voice of the Committee on Commerce. The bill in its main features has been so often discussed here that its character and object are pretty well understood. The bill as now presented has been amended in several particulars, and some important amendments have been adopted. It relates to a subject which, perhaps, as much as any other has commanded the attention and excited the interest, the hopes, and the wishes of the people of this country.

All I deem it necessary to say now is that, the subject being of so great general interest, the committee felt justified in asking the House to set a time for its consideration. It has been suggested to me by gentlemen on the floor that it would have been well to fix a limit to the discussion of the question; but gentlemen, I think, may trust that the friends of the measure, if the House should determine to set this bill for consideration, will place a proper limit on the discussion, and not allow it to run to any unreasonable extent so as to interfere with the consideration of other matters properly claiming the attention of the House.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not concur with the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as to limiting debate on this bill. Should it be reached upon the 13th of April I would be opposed to limiting debate. In the last Congress there was debate upon this subject extending through two or three weeks until the question really was exhausted, gentlemen favoring and those opposing the bill being allowed full latitude of discussion. It is now proposed to bring the question up again in this House, and I think the House will want to debate the measure extensively. Every gentleman desiring to speak upon it should be permitted to do so, because while on the one side it is considered a very important bill, I wish to state that on the other side, so far as I am concerned, I regard what is called "the Reagan bill," for the consideration of which this resolution proposes to fix a day, as an exceedingly unimportant measure. I, and others who think with me, desire to debate this question fully. A minority of the Committee on Commerce design bringing into the House within a very few days a report expressing their views, and also a bill intended as a substitute for the bill of the majority and containing provisions which the minority of the committee can sustain. On behalf of that minority I will say that I do not suppose any one gentleman of the minority desires not to have an interstate-commerce bill passed, but if legislation on this subject is needed, a bill should be passed which will meet the wants of the country at the present time and will not disturb vested rights—a bill which will control to a certain extent the manner of shipment, while giving carriers a voice as to what should or should not be done.

The committee has authorized the gentleman from Texas, its chairman, to make this motion for a suspension of the rules in order to fix a day to consider this subject. I desire, if it be in order now, to reserve all points of order upon this bill. At the same time I wish to say that I shall not vote to suspend the rules if I understand it is the design of the gentleman from Texas to check debate in any way, to close debate before every member of the House desiring to speak has given his views. I will ask the gentleman from Texas, if he will permit me, whether it is his design in any way to limit debate on this bill if it should be reached on the 13th of April?

Mr. REAGAN. So far as I am concerned I shall be disposed to allow reasonable debate; but I should not desire to see the debate run to an unreasonable extent. The subject has been so much discussed heretofore that I take it a very great length of time will not be required for its discussion. But I desire to see full and fair debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Speaker, I desire to see debate until the question is exhausted by argument on both sides. I do not wish to see the debate limited; it was not limited in the last Congress. I hope that before many days the minority of the committee will bring before the House their report and a substitute bill, so that when members come to examine "the Reagan bill," authorized to be reported by the Committee on Commerce, they may at the same time take into consideration the report of the minority of the committee and the measure which the minority are willing to vote for and hope to see this House sustain.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] so much of my time as he may desire.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to make an inquiry. If this resolution be adopted and the consideration of the bill when it is reached should not be concluded on Thursday will it run into Friday, which is private-bill day? The resolution, as I understand, is absolute in its terms, and it seems to me to be obnoxious to that objection.

Mr. REAGAN. In drawing the resolution I did not think of private-bill day; but I will ask consent of the House to modify the resolution so as to except private-bill day from its operation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Texas it has been heretofore decided that when a bill is made a special order for a particular day and from day to day thereafter, the measure does not occupy the time of the House on Friday unless that be one of the days specially named. In the absence of any such express language, the rule of the House setting apart that day for the consideration of private bills is not interfered with.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the effect of this resolution, if adopted, will be to put this bill, which is now very near the foot of the Calendar, up to the head of the Calendar on the morning of April 13. Now I do not understand the propriety of giving precedence to the work of one committee in this way. I do not know that I have any particular objection to this bill; but there are other bills equally meritorious, equally important, which are farther up on the Calendar; and it seems to me they should not be displaced.

A MEMBER. What are they?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We have four bills from the Committee on Labor; and the other day, after having used seven minutes of the hour, when we asked for an additional fifty-three minutes it was denied to us. When we asked that Thursday night be set apart for the consideration of our business, that was denied us. When we asked that on Saturday we should have this time, it was denied us; and one of those objections came from a member of the Committee on Commerce. These are bills demanded by the voice of the laboring men of this country; and we ask that nothing shall be done to displace them upon the Calendar.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY].

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] says this interstate-commerce bill is an unimportant measure.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, I did not exactly say that.

Mr. HENLEY. I do not yield.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. What I said was that the bill which was presented by the committee and which is called the Reagan bill is an unimportant measure.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman, and I think the House did, to speak as I have quoted him, but at all events I am quite certain the gentleman said something the tendency of which was to belittle the Reagan bill. That was the substance of his observation, and he was followed in that by the gentleman who succeeded him in the debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to be quoted as saying this was not an important question.

Mr. HENLEY. I decline to yield further. Mr. Speaker, there is no piece of legislation now before this Congress, or which has come before antecedent Congresses, which has more profoundly stirred the pulses of the American people and created a more widespread solicitude than this same matter of the regulation of interstate commerce. And it has been by reason of just such measures of antagonism as we now see on this floor that it has been hitherto retarded, delayed, or defeated; that is, by dilatory means and by belittling the bill itself by saying that other measures are of greater importance and the like. Why, sir, the importance of this bill to the people upon the Pacific coast, whom I in part represent, is beyond calculation. It is seen in the present condition of affairs, because for the first time in the history of these railroads we find a person can go from here to San Francisco for $50, which is as much as the fare should ever have been. This results from the fact that the pools have been broken and some measure of justice is being meted out to the people at this time. Pass this Reagan bill, respond to the public sentiment throughout the nation demanding its passage, and then we may have some means, some facilities for transportation, for getting from one side of this continent to the other, commensurate with its cost. Forbid, break up this iniquitous pooling which destroys competition, and the people will be the beneficiaries.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] deprecates putting this bill at the top of the Calendar. A friend near me says that is the very place where it ought to go. It ought to be there, Mr. Speaker, because the people have said in convention, they have said in every available way, through every avenue by which public opinion can be formulated or expressed, that interstate commerce should and ought to be regulated, and regulated as I believe in the method and by the manner provided by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] who, if he transmits nothing else to posterity, the association of his name with this interstate-commerce measure will exalt him in the estimation of generations to come.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to say this——

Mr. REAGAN. Not in my time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield the time to my colleague.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from California has not yet had an opportunity to see the report which will come from the minority of the Committee on Commerce. He has not had the opportunity to see the bill which will be recommended for passage by the minority of that committee. It is the bill which it is proposed to pass instead of the Reagan bill, as it is called.

Mr. HENLEY. I saw it at the last session of Congress.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman has not seen the bill recommended by the minority of the Committee on Commerce at this session.

Mr. HENLEY. It necessarily must be similar to the minority report of the last session.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. All I have to say is this: That however important it may be to have the regulation of interstate commerce, and however necessary to pass such a bill for that purpose, it will be found the measure recommended by the minority of the committee is in every way superior to that presented by the majority of the committee.

Mr. HENLEY. That minority report comes from the identical source from which the minority report came at the last Congress, and I surmise it is about the same. We can readily judge what it is.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I rise for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is it in order now to move an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order. It is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution,

Mr. REAGAN. I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. I shall vote for this resolution to fix a date to consider this bill. It is an important bill to the whole country. It is a measure demanded by the people, and one we must consider sooner or later. Opposition to the bill, in my opinion, comes from influences which are inimical to the best interests of the people.

Mr. BINGHAM. Are there any petitions on file for the passage of this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Not one.

Mr. BAYNE. It is recommended by the boards of trade. It is asked for by shippers and by the public press. The demand for such a measure has been made on all hands.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am informed there is not one petition on file in this Congress asking for any such measure.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know whether there has been or not, but I know shippers from one end of the country to the other ask Congress shall take some action in favor of doing away with unjust discrimination.

Mr. LONG. It may be, but it has all died out.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to name a board of trade that has asked the passage of this Reagan bill.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know that I can name one specially. Resolutions, however, have been presented here coming from boards of trade; and I know they have passed upon the question. I know too that the appeal is made by the shippers of this country and by the people generally to Congress to have some action taken to regulate this matter.

Mr. REAGAN. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the question of interstate commerce, next to the currency question, is the greatest question agitating the minds of the people of this country to-day, and both are labor questions in the broadest possible sense of the term. This bill affects every village and hamlet in the land, and should for a score of valid reasons have a regular and speedy hearing in this House, during which it may be discussed and voted on by the representatives of the people. Let us place ourselves squarely on record concerning this important bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. REAGAN. While I am on the floor I would like to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REAGAN. If this order is made will it interfere with the introduction of bills or the suspension of the rules on Mondays?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House, while they set apart Friday, as stated by the Chair a few moments ago, for the consideration of private bills, do not specifically set apart Monday for the suspension of the rules, but simply provide that it shall be in order on that day to move to suspend the rules. If the gentleman from Texas will call up his bill on Monday the question of consideration could be raised against it, as has been frequently decided heretofore, and it is then for the House to determine whether it will go on with the bill on Monday or whether it will proceed with the other order of business which is in order on that day, namely, the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. If I can have the consent of the House I will modify the resolution so as not to embrace Monday to interfere with the regular business on that day.

The SPEAKER. The matter rests entirely under the control of the gentleman if this resolution shall be adopted. If the gentleman does not call up the bill on Monday there will be no conflict.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I will inform the House that I will not call it up on Monday.

Mr. DUNHAM. Or on any Monday.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, if this resolution should be adopted if it will not deprive the House of the two morning hours, one for the call of committees and one for the consideration of bills, while this bill is under consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, from the terms of this resolution, if adopted, that the gentleman from Texas might call this bill up immediately after the reading of the Journal if he saw proper to do so, in which case, as the Chair has just stated, the question of consideration could be raised, and the House would determine which business it preferred to go on with; whether the bill to which this resolution refers or the regular order of business fixed in the morning hour.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Texas will give me his attention a moment, I would like to know if we can not have the assurance from him that this bill will not be called up at a time to antagonize the morning hour?

Mr. REAGAN. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that I will not, in the event of the adoption of this resolution, interfere with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the morning hour is one thing and the hour for the consideration of bills quite another.

Mr. REAGAN. I will embrace both hours in this statement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further debate, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote."]

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to consume the time of the House if the House wishes to vote now. If agreeable to the gentleman from Texas, at whose request I have taken the floor, I would yield the time that the House may now take a vote.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. HENLEY, and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Several MEMBERS. It is not necessary to consume time by a roll-call.

Mr. REAGAN. If in order, Mr. Speaker, I will ask consent to withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays, as there seems to be a disposition on the part of the House to save the time occupied in calling the roll.

The SPEAKER. The demand was made by the gentleman from California and sustained by the House. The gentleman can move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 44, not voting 83; as follows:

So the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I object.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the names be dispensed with. It is consuming time unnecessarily.

The objection to dispensing with the reading of the names was withdrawn.

The following members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. ELLSBERRY with Mr. LYMAN.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. DORSEY.

The following members were announced as paired for the rest of this day:

Mr. HILL with Mr. BURNES.

Mr. IRION with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. ST. MARTIN with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. REED, of Maine.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. RANDALL.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the House will not adjourn. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his motion for the present. There is a bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture which we desire to have passed. I do not think it will occupy five minutes.

Several members called for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 78, noes 76.

Mr. HATCH. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 48 members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Illinois,

Mr. MORRISON, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HATCH, to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 85.

So the House refused to adjourn.

TRANSFER OF APPROPRIATION.

The Committee on Agriculture was called.

Mr. HATCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 4083) to empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to transfer certain appropriation.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Agriculture be, and is hereby, authorized to transfer from the unexpended balance of the appropriation for a laboratory, Department of Agriculture, 1885, a sum not to exceed $1,800 to the appropriation for purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, 1885.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules. Is a second demanded?

A second was not demanded.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill was passed.

COMMITTEE VACANCIES FILLED.

The SPEAKER announced vacancies on committees filled as follows:

Committee on Elections—Mr. ROWELL, in place of Mr. HAHN, deceased.

Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River—Mr. HUDD, in place of Mr. RANKIN, deceased.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, two reports of Special Agent O. L. Spaulding in relation to the charge of fraudulent importation of Chinese into the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. CONGER, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the communication from the Secretary of the Interior furnished to the Senate yesterday in response to a resolution which I offered on the 17th of last December, transmitting information in relation to land-grant railroads in the State of Kansas, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, without printing.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of John Ball Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Mowrystown, Ohio, praying for additional pension legislation; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Fremont, Ohio, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvements, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Grange No. 1002, Patrons of Husbandry, of Northrup, Ohio, praying for prompt and favorable action on House bill No. 5190, to enlarge the power and duties of the Department of Agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 999 and Senate bills Nos. 265 and 1003, relating to pilots and pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Goshen, Ind., praying that liberal appropriations be made for public works, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BERRY presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Pine Bluff, Ark., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of John Arthur Lynch, a citizen of the United States, praying for the survey of a line for a railway from the northwestern boundary of the United States through British Columbia to Alaska. The petition states with a great deal of force and clearness important reasons with reference to our foreign commerce, its relation to the development of railway lines in India and Canada, and the possible construction of a line through the Chinese Empire. I suppose it would be proper that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations rather than to the Committee on Commerce, as it relates to a foreign railway proposed to be constructed by the United States. I have a bill in regard to the same matter which I shall introduce when that order of business is reached.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a document. I have examined it, and it is well worth the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the petition be printed as a document. If there be no objection that order will be made. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of George Bliss, of Warren, Mass., and a petition of members of the Grand Army of the Republic in Massachusetts, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1783) granting an increase of pension to George Bliss; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of 15 clergymen, 7 physicians, 2 lawyers, 13 teachers, 85 business men, and 21 officers of temperance and other societies, citizens of Michigan, and a petition of 11 clergymen, 11 physicians, 5 lawyers, 47 teachers, 88 business men, and 34 officers of temperance and other societies of Shiawassee and Gratiot Counties, Michigan, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Otisville, Mich., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Mount Clemens, Mich., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 1914) for the restoration of wages in the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANDERSON presented the petition of Allen Root and other citizens of Nebraska, praying for legislation to place all imitations of and substitutes for butter under the control of the Internal Revenue Department; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Manistee, Mich., praying for the enactment of a law making it a misdemeanor to employ persons under twenty-one years of age more than eight hours a day in any manufacturing, mining, or mercantile business; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Decatur, Mich.,

praying that Congress relieve the distress of the laboring classes by liberal appropriations for public works of national importance; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of managers of the savings-banks of the State of New York, praying for the repeal of the law directing the coinage of the 412½-grain silver dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EVARTS presented petitions of Knights of Labor of New York, Jefferson, Orleans, and Niagara Counties, in the State of New York, praying for liberal appropriations for public works by the United States Government, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVARTS. I present a communication in the nature of a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the construction of a bridge across the Arthur Kill, between the States of New York and New Jersey. I ask that the recital and the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce, which are quite brief, be read, and that they and the whole communication from the Chamber of Commerce be printed in the RECORD.

The preamble and resolutions were read, and the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The construction of a bridge across the Arthur Kill, between the States of New York and New Jersey.

At a special meeting of the chamber of commerce, held Saturday, March 13, 1886, the following report and resolutions, submitted by the committee of the chamber on internal trade and improvements, were unanimously adopted:

To the Chamber of Commerce:

Your committee on internal trade and improvements, to whom was referred the preamble and resolution, presented at the last regular meeting of the chamber, favoring the early passage of a bill now before Congress authorizing the construction of a railway viaduct across Arthur Kill, a navigable stream between New Jersey and New York, respectfully report as follows:

There are two bills now before Congress touching this subject—one known as Senate bill No. 121, and the other as House of Representatives bill No. 5864. These bills were identical when introduced in the two Houses of Congress, but Senate bill No. 121 has been reported with some amendments, and its passage in the amended form recommended by the Committee on Commerce of that body. Your committee are of the opinion that the amendments thus proposed are of sufficient importance to make Senate bill No. 121 preferable; they therefore recommend its consideration only by the chamber. Both bills, however, are hereto attached for your information.

Senate bill No. 121 would authorize and make lawful the construction of a bridge across Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, by the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company and the Baltimore and New York Railroad Company, or either of them, under certain conditions named in the bill, the most important of which may be briefly stated, as follows:

It is provided that all railway companies desiring to use the said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage over it and in the use of its machinery and approaches, for reasonable compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in case they shall not agree. It is also provided that the plan and location of the bridge shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, and until he approve the same the bridge shall not be built. The provisions of the bill as to details of construction, operation, and maintenance seem wise and ample.

A representative of those most interested in the navigation of the Kills, composing Staten Island Sound, appeared before your committee and opposed favorable action by the chamber respecting either of the bills before Congress, on the ground that the place of construction of the bridge should be definitely located in the bill. Your committee are of the opinion, however, that the provisions of the bill in this respect are wise, and that any controversy which may arise as to the location of the bridge should be left for adjustment, as the bill provides, to the Secretary of War, who (as stated in the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce), "will doubtless be governed in his action by the report of engineer officers thoroughly familiar with the sound, and who are eminently qualified to determine what is properly a question of engineering." While opposing favorable action by the chamber, on the ground stated, the same representative, however, declared himself decidedly in favor of a bridge over the Arthur Kill to connect the shores of New Jersey with those of Staten Island.

In conclusion, your committee, having given the subject such investigation as the brief time given them in which to report would allow, are of opinion that the construction of the proposed bridge, and the judicious and honest development of the water front of Staten Island, which is quite sure to follow, will be of incalculable benefit to the commerce of the country, without sacrifice of or injury to any commerce now existing along or passing through the water way proposed to be bridged.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the adoption by the chamber of the preamble and resolution referred to them, namely:

Whereas the terminal accommodation in the harbor of New York is now severely taxed by reason of the great growth of the commerce of the port, and any enlargement of the facilities for the receipt, storage, and shipment of the exports and imports should be by every lawful means encouraged; and

Whereas there are miles of the water front of the west side of the harbor, comprising the Staten Island shore, only partially developed and improved because of its separation from the mainland by the Arthur Kill, or Staten Island Sound, thereby rendering said shore inaccessible to railway communication; and

Whereas a bill is now before the Senate of the United States, known as Senate bill No. 121, authorizing the construction of a railway bridge across the Arthur Kill, being a navigable stream between the States of New Jersey and New York, and the provisions of the said bill having been approved of by the engineers of the War Department:

Be it therefore resolved, That this chamber respectfully and earnestly desires to impress upon members of Congress the advantage of the early passage of the said bill, because of the benefits that will flow from the construction of this bridge, not only to the port of New York, but to the commerce of the entire country.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing report and resolution, authenticated by the signatures of the president and secretary and by the seal of the chamber, be sent to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War, and to each member of Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANKLIN EDSON, Chairman.

NEW YORK, 12th March, 1886.

A true copy.
[SEAL.]

JAS. M. BROWN, President.
GEORGE WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Methuen, Mass., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the early construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the executive officers of the Association for Works of Mercy in the District of Columbia, praying that certain additional appropriations be made; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PIKE presented a petition of the State of New Hampshire, by the governor of that State, praying full reimbursement of national bounties advanced to recruits mustered into the service of the United States under the President's call of October, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. I present a petition of the president, vice-president, and officers of a charitable association in Washington, D. C., and certain other ladies, praying legislation for the legal protection of young girls in the District of Columbia. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Senate joint resolution pertaining to the defense of the seacoast of the United States from a foreign foe.

Whereas in time of peace every nation ought to prepare for war; and

Whereas the armored ships and heavy ordnance in use generally in the navies of the various nations of the world require for adequate defense on land the best fortifications and heaviest guns that ingenuity and money can provide; and

Whereas Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries pass through and render possible access by war vessels to the finest sections of Maryland and Virginia, including also the District of Columbia and the national capital, as also a means of interrupting or destroying a large and valuable section of American commerce by an enemy; and

Whereas the entrance to Chesapeake Bay is of such a character that defense by torpedoes is difficult, if not impossible, and can only be defended, if at all, by armored ships of war, monitors, or other floating batteries, against a hostile fleet; and

Whereas, by reason of the prohibition of the Federal Constitution, the several States are incompetent to make any provision for their own defense, and the revenues and finances of the United States are in such a condition as to warrant the expenditure of a sufficient sum of money for the defense of the seacoast of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That we respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States the necessity of making immediate provision for placing the seacoast of the country in a condition for successful defense against a foreign enemy, and we request our Senators and Representatives from Maryland to use every legitimate means to promote such measures and appropriations as will tend to attain the above general object, and more especially the protection of Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries by land fortifications and floating vessels and batteries of the most approved models.

EDWIN WARFIELD,
President of the Senate.
JOSEPH B. SETH,
Speaker of the House of Delegates.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Baltimore and Westernport, in the State of Maryland, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEORGE presented the petition of Susan A. Shelby, of Washington, D. C., praying reimbursement for the loss of property taken by the United States Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Kirksville, Adair County, Missouri, praying that liberal appropriations of the revenues of the Government be made for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I present several papers intended to be submitted to the Senate for reference to the Committee on Public Lands, relating to the selection of homesteads made by settlers who are citizens of Florida of United States lands for swamp and overflowed lands. The petition of N. N. Scott and M. B. Taylor, of Fort Ogden, Fla., states that improper selections have been made by parties who never laid eyes on the land; that the special agent of the Land Office was said to have investigated certain lands there, and to have caused the patenting of the same when they were not subject to the swamp and overflowed land grant. The petition states that great grievances have been suffered by settlers and homesteaders in that State on that account. A similar statement is made by John K. Liles, of Fort Ogden, Fla. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, presented a petition of 19 clergymen, 14 physicians, 19 lawyers, 15 teachers, 100 business men, and 42 officers of temperance and other societies of White and Woodford Counties, State of Arkansas, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 996) for the relief of Leslie Bassett, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 885) to relieve the State of Colorado from charges on account of ordance stores furnished to the State and Territory, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 387) to define the status and for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of certain recruits for the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry Volunteers who were killed at Lawrence, Kans., August 21, 1863, by guerrillas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 872) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a lot in the city of Jacksonville, Fla., for military purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 953) for the relief of Arthur L. Fisk, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 836) for the relief of William M. Shimmins and George H. McPherson, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 972) for the relief of Thomas P. Morgan, jr., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petitions of Rebecca T. Bowen, James A. Brown, A. S. Cheney, George L. Gray, and Handy Summerline, praying to have their claims referred to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the so-called Bowman act, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beauboucher, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1041) for the relief of William B. Gropp, of Newport, R. I., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 3) for the relief of the widow and children of John W. Judson, late agent of the United States at Oswego, N. Y., for public works on Lake Ontario, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4837) for the relief of Mary E. Whitehead, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of John C. Myers, formerly consul-general at Shanghai, China, praying for the reimbursement of moneys expended in exposing alleged "frauds and irregularities" in office of Oliver B. Bradford and George F. Seward, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. 56) authorizing Augustus J. Cassard to accept a gold medal conferred upon him by the Government of France; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] desired me to say that he dissents from this report.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 16) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie Maynadier Phelps, widow of Capt. Seth Ledyard Phelps, late minister of the United States to Peru, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to; and submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 1899) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie Maynadier Phelps, widow of Capt. Seth Ledyard Phelps, late minister of the United States to Peru; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 348) for the relief of Mrs. E. A. Benham, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry W. Benham, deceased, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

C. B. BRYAN & CO.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the following resolution—

Resolved, That the claim of Messrs. C. B. Bryan & Co., of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, for the value of a boat and its lading of coal, destroyed by collision with the United States snag-boat De Russy, in the Mississippi River, November 17, 1879 (said boat and cargo being valued by said claimants at $3,643.60), be referred to the Court of Claims, in conformity to the provisions of section 1059, Revised Statutes—reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

STORAGE OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE MATERIAL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably the bill (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883. As an emergency exists in regard to the rental of the Globe building, which is occupied in part by the Public Printer, I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read in full for information.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $14,500 to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883.

Mr. MANDERSON. In February, 1883, on account of the crowded condition of the Public Printing Office, and because of fears that were entertained as to the safety of the building, Congress passed an act authorizing the renting of storage rooms. Under the provisions of that act rooms were rented in the old Congressional Globe building for storage purposes. The last appropriation for the payment of the rent of those rooms was entirely used on the 20th of February of this year. The bill proposes to appropriate sufficient money to pay the rental of the rooms rented until June 30, 1887; that is, for the rest of the present fiscal year and for the coming year. I ask that a letter from the Public Printer be read by the Secretary to show the necessity of this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1886.

SIR: In regard to the special appropriation for removal and storage, I beg to say that the annual rental of the Globe building, as now occupied, amounts to $2,664.

The removal necessitates the employment of extra laborers, watchmen, and team, requiring an annual expenditure of $6,630. This latter expenditure is sometimes paid out of the appropriation for printing and binding, but I think it is more properly chargeable to the appropriation for removal and storage.

This office occupies five rooms in the Globe building, amounting to 16,000 square feet, and this storage room is not only absolutely necessary, but more is required.

I inclose herewith memorandum of the various rooms, and the amount paid; also the total rent paid since the passage of the bill.

It will require about $14,500 from February 20, 1886, to June 30, 1887, to pay the whole expense of removal and storage, and I respectfully request that this amount be substituted for that mentioned in my former letter.

The leases are made for a term not exceeding six months, which would enable the Public Printer to promptly occupy the new building should Congress order the same.

The above appropriation is imperatively required for the safety of the employés of the Government Printing Office, the particulars of which were set forth in the debate by Governor Anthony, chairman Senate Committee on Printing, at the time of the passage of the removal and storage act.

Very respectfully,

S. P. ROUNDS, Public Printer.

Hon. E. BARKSDALE,
Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4083) to empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to transfer a certain appropriation; and

A bill (H. R. 6661) to provide for closing up the business and paying the expenses of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 1900) for the final settlement of the claims of the State of New Hampshire for the reimbursement of national bounties advanced to recruits mustered into the service of the United States under the President's call of October, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 1901) granting a pension to George Fetterman;

A bill (S. 1902) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann E. Lamburg; and

A bill (S. 1903) granting a pension to Mrs. A. M. Smith.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1904) granting a pension to Allen P. Jacobs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1905) for the protection of the hotel proprietors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1906) to extend the general land and mining laws of the United States over the Territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I have not read the bill, and I introduce it by request; but it comes from a source which satisfies me that it is a bill deserving of attention. I move its reference to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I introduce from the same source, also by request, another bill.

The bill (S. 1907) to facilitate the settlement and develop the resources of the Territory of Alaska, and to open an overland commercial route between the United States, Asiatic Russia, and Japan, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4083) to empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to transfer a certain appropriation was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. 6661) to provide for closing up the business and paying the expenses of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to examine the nature and extent of the alleged use and destruction of timber on the public lands adjoining the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, particularly by the Montana Improvement Company; also by what authority they take said timber, and what, if any, additional legislation is necessary to protect timber on the public domain, with power to send for persons and papers.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce be made a special order for Tuesday, March 30. It is an important bill, and I think that justice to the public requires it to be considered as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion?

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection, but I desire to be heard on the question.

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects.

Mr. CULLOM. May I inquire of the Senator from Kansas if he rose to object to the motion I made in relation to the bill to regulate commerce?

Mr. PLUMB. I did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered on the record in the form of a resolution for consideration to-morrow. It goes over under objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is now closed. Under the order of the Senate yesterday the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has the floor upon the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield one moment that I may ask to place on its passage Senate bill 1127, a pension bill to correct the name of a soldier in an act that was passed at the last session of Congress? It is a bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and reported by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] on behalf of the chairman of the committee; and as the Senator from New Hampshire is not now present, I ask that the Senate put the bill on its passage. It is No. 208 in the Order of Business.

Mr. HOAR. I will yield for that motion, the pending bill being laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska, with the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts, moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1127) to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1885, granting a pension to Sarah Hague.

The motion was agreed to.

SARAH HAGUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1127) to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1885, granting a pension to Sarah Hague. It proposes to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1885, granting a pension to Sarah Hague, so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Hague, dependent mother of William Hague, late of Company L, Sixth New York Heavy Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday asked a question as to the significance of a verbal amendment then made substituting the word "authority" for "tribunal" in several places where the latter occurred in the original draught of this bill, which question I undertook to answer this morning. I wish to take a minute or two only in regard to the bill as it now stands.

The present condition of the law in regard to the counting of the vote for President and Vice-President would render it almost impossible to accomplish that result in case of any difference of opinion between the two branches, and indeed in case of any serious question which might arise, without some special legislation or the adoption of some special rule at the time of ascertaining the result of any particular election. In other words, we have been compelled, for the last four or five Presidential elections, in one or two cases to adopt a standing joint rule, which was abrogated by the refusal of one House or the other to submit to its authority; or in one case by a statute passed in 1877; and in the two cases since 1876, by a special joint rule or order adopted to apply to the particular and special case. Now, every Senator will admit that this condition of things constitutes a great and serious public danger, and that we should be absolutely false to our official obligations if we did not endeavor to remedy it and to provide against the danger.

This bill fails to provide for a decision of the case and the admission of the electoral vote of a State where there are two rival State governments and those rival State governments present two competing sets of electors for the counting of their votes; and everybody who knows the present condition of the public opinion, the opinion of the two Houses, knows that it is impossible to provide in the present condition of opinion for a common arbiter between these two branches in that case. That is not provided for now. If the next Presidential election occur without any new law or new rule, and in any State in the country there be two State governments and an existing civil war or a conflict between these two competing governments not amounting to war, and the two Houses of Congress so differ in political opinion that one favors the claim of one State government and the other of the other, there is no method now by which the electors representing either of those governments can be counted in making up the result.

So then the criticism on this bill that it does not provide for that case by settling between those two claimants which of the two is the lawful State government, is a criticism on the existing condition of the law. It is one which, in the present condition of political sentiment in Congress, it is utterly impossible to deal with; and it seems to me that no just criticism can be made upon the present bill, because it improves upon the existing condition of things in all other respects and removes and provides for all other possible and conceivable dangers.

The bill provides that in case there be but one return from a State, that return shall not be rejected without the concurrence of both Houses of Congress. In case the State itself has provided by its own law an instrumentality for the final determination of all such questions, by a law passed more than six days before the assembling of its electoral college, the decision of the State is to be taken as valid in all cases. So I believe that this bill will remove from the public all dangers which are likely to arise in this country for generations in regard to the peaceful and proper determining of the result of the Presidential elections.

When the bill was up before, it was criticised by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] as seeming by its phraseology, using the words "tribunal" and "court," to invite a judicial interference with what, in the judgment of that Senator, should be a political process. The bill has been changed in that particular by substituting the language of the second section, that when the State shall have provided for the final determination of any controversy or contest by judicial or other methods of procedure, its decision shall be final, then instead of using the word "tribunal," as before, using the word "authority" for the State functionaries who are to settle this question. It is supposed that the criticism has been met by that modification.

That is the only substantial change in the bill, except that the bill also as now drafted provides that the executive of the State shall immediately after the canvass or final ascertainment of the election of electors in accordance with the laws of the State, transmit that canvass and final ascertainment to the Secretary of State to be published in some newspaper by him designated, and also that a copy of that certificate shall be sent with the electoral vote by the electors in the way now provided by law to the President of the Senate.

I have stated all the change which has been made in the bill, and I hope it will meet the nearly unanimous approbation of this body.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question before he takes his seat, and that is, if this bill makes any provision for a case where the executive of a State being opposed in political feeling and sentiment to the electors as they may have been elected shall fail or refuse to make the certificate required at his hands? In a case of that sort, I ask if any provision has been made for determining the vote of the State? Without the certificate of the governor how can the vote of the State be ascertained and counted?

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that no law can make provision for the failure of public officers to perform their duty in all cases. I believe Mr. Webster once stated in an important debate that if the members-elect of the United States Senate should refuse to assemble there was no earthly provision which would prevent the Republic from going to pieces; and so if the States and the people refuse to perform their duty. The Constitution itself provides for the sending of the electoral votes to the President of the Senate; and the old act of Congress of 1792 passed soon after the first inauguration of the Government made no provision for the case of the supreme executive authority of a State refusing to give the electors certificates of their election, or of the proper State officers refusing to send those evidences here. I suppose if the governor of a State or the officer to whom that function is committed were to refuse to perform his duty, or if the electors of a State were to refuse to send their votes after they had cast them to the President of the Senate, those are cases not now provided for, through which the State might lose its vote. At any rate we can not undertake to go through the list of all the officers and provide against a neglect of all of them. Suppose the President of the Senate should burn up the votes after they were conveyed to him and before they were to be opened. You can conceive at every step in a republican government the possibility of some person on whose conscientious and faithful discharge of official duty the going on of the Government in an orderly manner depends refusing to perform his duty. No legislation can provide for such cases in advance.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that reported this bill, I was unable to concur in the conclusions at which that committee arrived.

There are some valuable provisions in this bill, and among them is the provision which prescribes the mode and manner in which the actions of the States shall be certified to Congress. Another is the effect given to a determination made in pursuance of the law of the State as to who were legally and constitutionally appointed electors. But there are some very grave omissions in this bill, and among them is the one to which I have just called the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts.

There is no provision in this bill for the case of a recusancy on the part of an executive officer of a State to make the proper certificates by which we can have the vote of that State ascertained and counted, according to our duty under the Constitution; and it is no answer to that to say, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that there are cases in which we can not provide for a dereliction of duty on the part of officers charged with duties under the Constitution. It is not beyond the competency of Congress to make provision for the ascertainment of the vote of a particular State or any State on a Presidential election, whether the governor of that State shall perform his duty or not. It is within the competency of Congress to provide other means to ascertain how the vote of that State was cast, notwithstanding the dereliction on the part of the governor.

Another great omission is the leaving unsettled the question raised by an amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. That amendment raised this question, which is not settled in this bill: What is to be done, when the vote of a State may be rejected, with reference to the aggregate number of votes, a majority of which is necessary to elect a President? Under the present apportionment there are 401 electoral votes. If 20 of those were rejected and not counted, the question is whether a person receiving a majority of the 381 which are counted, and not receiving a majority of the 401 which may have been appointed, is to be regarded as elected President of the United States, or whether the case has happened in which the House of Representatives shall exercise their power to elect.

This is a very grave and a very important question, and it ought not to have been left unsettled by this bill. It would be entirely immaterial whether the vote of a particular State was counted or rejected if when it was rejected there was still a person voted for as President who had a majority of all the electoral votes. In that case the rejection would have no effect upon the determination of the Presidential election; but if it be that the person having the majority only of votes which are counted is to be President, there will be a temptation on the part of the one House or the other to reject votes in order that a person not having a constitutional majority may be declared President. That is a grave defect.

If it be assumed, as I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say on a former occasion when debating this bill, that he is President who receives a majority of the votes actually counted when that number is less than a majority of the whole number appointed, I insist that that would be a plain violation of the Constitution. The Constitution provides:

> The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors—appointed.

Now under this bill, on a difference between the two Houses, the Senate may affirm by its vote that one set of electors from a State have been duly appointed and the House of Representatives may affirm on its part that another set of electors have been appointed. In that case there has been no legal determination that there has been no appointment from that State, but an affirmance by one House that one set has been appointed and an affirmance by the other House that another set has been appointed. So the case as it stands is not that electors have not been appointed in particular States—that is conceded by the action of both Houses—but the situation is that the Houses fail to agree as to who have been appointed, the fact of appointment being asserted and affirmed by both Houses. In a case of that sort, if the person having the largest number of votes which are actually counted and less than a majority of the whole number which have been actually appointed shall be President of the United States he will be President in violation of the Constitution, as I understand it, and as I think it is plainly written.

Then, there is another very serious objection to this bill, and that goes to its very marrow and pith. It is in the mode, or rather in the tribunal, which this bill establishes for the purpose of ascertaining the votes that are to be counted. The Constitution says:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

That means this plainly and unequivocally: First, a command to count the votes; second, a command to count them in the presence of the two Houses. They can not be constitutionally counted in any other mode or in any other presence. To count a vote necessarily involves first the ascertainment of the vote to be counted. When, therefore, the Constitution commands that the votes shall be counted in the presence of the two Houses, it commands necessarily that the necessary and that the essential steps and processes in the counting shall be performed in their presence. So, when the Constitution says the votes shall be counted in the presence of the two Houses, it means that everything involved in the process of counting shall be done then and there and in that presence. You can not count or enumerate a thing until you first ascertain what that thing is. To count in the Constitution means as well ascertainment of the thing to be counted as an enumeration of the thing after it has been ascertained. There is no escape from this argument. You can not count effectually unless the thing to be counted is ascertained. Ascertainment therefore is a logical and necessary part of the process of counting, as much so as enumeration.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether it would not be equally true to say that in case of an electoral vote you can not ascertain the thing to be counted until you count it? You have got to take the votes one by one and ascertain whether they belong to a certain category.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not exactly understand the question of the Senator. I will answer it though in this way, that counting in the Constitution means first the ascertainment of the vote to be counted, then the arithmetical enumeration of the votes, the footing of them up, and seeing who has the largest number.

Mr. HOAR. Then, if my friend will permit me to vary my question a little, would he not withdraw the last proposition he made? I understand him to affirm that before the process of counting, using the word "counting" in its constitutional sense, can advance you have got to ascertain the thing to be counted. I understood him to say that is counting.

Mr. GEORGE. My proposition is that counting involves two things, ascertainment and enumeration.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator stated it differently, and said that before you could count in a constitutional sense you must ascertain.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought I made myself very well and plainly understood that the word "count" as used in the Constitution involved two processes—ascertainment and enumeration. That being established, that the word "count" does involve these two processes—and I do not understand the Senator from Massachusetts to deny that, but to correct me for, as he supposed, stating it differently—what results? We are commanded to "count" in the presence of the two Houses. Counting involves ascertainment as well as enumeration. Then, without violating the Constitution, how can you separate these two necessary processes involved in the word "count," and require the ascertainment to be made somewhere else and the enumeration only to be made in the presence of the two Houses? There is no affirmative answer to that proposition, as I conceive.

Now, sir, if the ascertainment is a part of the counting process, and the most essential part of it, and the Constitution requires this whole counting process to be done in the presence of the two Houses, then the next question is by what method you will perform these two processes. You can not perform them by the two Houses in joint convention, each in the same room and acting separately. The ascertainment and counting must be in the presence of both. That means not only the corporeal presence, the assemblage of both in the same room, but it means also the understanding or intelligent presence, or in other words that the process shall be so conducted that each House and each member of each House may understand it fully as it goes on.

Well, is it not the absurdest thing in the world that the two Houses should come into the same room, one presided over by the President of the Senate and the other by the Speaker of the House, and in order to comply with the Constitution each one, one on one side of the Hall and the other on the other side of the Hall, going through this process of ascertainment?

When the Constitution commands the counting and ascertainment to be done in the presence of the two Houses, in the intellectual and understanding presence of the two Houses, it also commands that it must be done in that mode by which the two Houses and the members thereof may understand it and supervise it; and that can only be done by treating the two Houses as the Constitution treats them for this purpose, as constituting one body.

The Constitution says that we shall meet together and the votes shall be counted in the presence of the two Houses. I have shown that can only be done by the two Houses acting as one joint assembly; and this bill now under consideration treats that as so, so far as the enumeration is concerned. This bill provides that the two Houses shall meet together in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and that the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer. How can he be presiding officer unless they constitute one assembly?

It furthermore provides that he shall preserve order. How can he preserve order if they be in fact two assemblies, organized for separate action, as in case of performing legislative duties? The bill furthermore provides that objections may be made in this joint assembly to the counting of a vote. Up to that point the bill itself treats the two Houses, when met together for the purpose of the electoral count, as one joint assembly; but right there when an objection is made and the real and substantial business for which the Constitution calls them together, the bill provides for a dissolution of this assembly, and then provides, after the two Houses have acted separately upon the question of ascertainment, that then there shall be another joint assembly and the other process of the counting be carried on. In other words, the bill treats this joint assemblage as one assembly for all the purposes of enumeration and compels them to separate for all the purposes of ascertainment, the two processes being involved necessarily in the word "count," which the Constitution requires to be done in the presence of an assembly composed of both.

I say there is no authority in the Constitution for that; and right here that is a conclusive answer to any argument of the two Houses acting separately in the matter, because the Constitution provides in the first article, seventh section, and third clause:

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States.

And shall have no effect unless approved by him. So the Constitution ordains that if it is necessary that these two Houses shall consider this question of ascertainment separately, and if the concurrence of one House to the action of the other be necessary, as this bill says it shall be, then it follows that that joint or concurrent vote, order, or resolution must be submitted to the President of the United States. Certainly it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to provide for a state of things of that description. But it is impossible to escape from the express language of the Constitution that "every order," not every bill, not every act, not every statute, but every "order," every "resolution," every "vote," in the language of the Constitution, to which the concurrence of the two Houses is necessary, shall be presented to the President for his signature. That I think is a conclusive objection to the mode prescribed in the bill for ascertaining the electoral vote by the separate order or vote of each House.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of my honorable friend if he thinks that provision of the Constitution applies to constitutional amendments?

Mr. GEORGE. I will answer that by saying that in order to pass a constitutional amendment a majority of two-thirds is required, which is the exact majority which can overrule the President's veto.

Mr. HOAR. That is after it has been presented to the President.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether that is so or not. It may be that in practice a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is not presented to the President; but if the practice has obtained of not presenting it to him it is because in the first instance it has to pass each House of Congress by a majority, which dispenses with the veto or overrules it.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator understand that the joint rules of the two Houses must be presented to the President because to their validity they require the concurrence of the two Houses?

Mr. GEORGE. I believe that the joint rules of the two Houses are secured in this way: By a provision in the Constitution each House is authorized to determine the rules of its own procedure, and in the exercise of that power the Senate may make rules for its separate action, and may also make rules besides its own separate rules for its joint action with the House, and in the same way the House may perform that function, and in that way reach joint rules.

So I stand upon the words of the Constitution itself: every order, every resolution, every vote (questions of adjournment alone excepted) to which the concurrence of the two Houses may be necessary shall be presented to the President.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me one moment——

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad to be interrupted if I am wrong.

Mr. HOAR. I put this question to the Senator with a view of calling his attention to the consideration that the provision that every order, vote, or resolution to which the concurrence of both Houses is necessary shall be presented to the President, except in a case of adjournment, never has been held anywhere, so far as I know, to apply to anything but legislative matters which are to take effect upon the people by the authority of the Congress. There are all through the Constitution, among the powers of these two Houses, powers which require the concurrence of the two Houses for their exercise, but which, not relating to legislation, are never held to require the assent of the President or to be presented to the President.

Now as to the matter of a constitutional amendment, it is true that a constitutional amendment can not be constitutionally presented to the States for their adoption except by a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress thinking it necessary; but if the Senator's argument was a sound one, that would not prevent the operation of the provisions that it should be presented to the President in the first instance, because his reasons for rejection might change the mind of the two-thirds which had originally presented it. But the only instance, I believe, in our history where a constitutional amendment has been sent to the President of the United States was one which was sent to President Lincoln, which he returned to Congress saying that he did not understand that he had any authority in the matter.

So in the matter of joint rules; we get the authority to pass joint rules from the Constitution, of course, as we get all the rest of our authority; but if this proposition of the Senator's was true we should be obliged to send our joint rules to the President for his consideration, if that is a universal and comprehensive proposition that all matters to which the assent of the two Houses is necessary must be submitted to the President—all votes, orders, or resolutions.

In other words, as I understand it, it has been the uniform construction of the Constitution that in regard to the matter of counting the electoral vote, conferred upon the two Houses as the majority of both Houses conceive by the Constitution itself, as in the matter of joint rules, as in the matter of amendments to the Constitution, they stand upon the separate power which is given for those purposes, and are not included in the phrase which is found in the section of the Constitution relating to legislation, and which is intended only to apply to that.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad the Senator has interrupted me because it enables me just here to make a conclusive answer to the objections which he urges.

I think it may be true that this clause which I have read only refers to legislative business, the art of making laws; but the answer I make to the Senator is that nowhere in the Constitution can the two Houses act separately, the concurrence of both being necessary to the validity of an act, except on legislative business. The Constitution only grants to Congress, that is to the Senate and House of Representatives, requiring their concurrent action, legislative powers; and that is one of the greatest objections to the provisions in this bill, that it undertakes, in violation of the scheme of the Constitution, in violation of the grants of the Constitution, to confer upon the two Houses acting separately and yet concurrently, the concurrence of the two being necessary to the validity of the act, upon a matter which is not legislative business.

What kind of business is it? It certainly is not legislative business. It is the ascertainment of a fact and a very important fact to this country. Where do you get the power under the Constitution for the two Houses acting separately and yet concurrently to discharge any other duty except a legislative one?

And that brings me to the last objection I intend to urge against this bill; and that is that this is not a legislative function which ought to be considered separately by the two Houses, but it is rather in the nature of a judicial function; and when the Constitution imposes on us the duty of counting the votes in the presence of the two Houses, it certainly meant that we should adopt that form in the performance of that duty which would enable us to discharge it. Why, certainly, sir, it would be an anomaly in jurisprudence, it would be an anomaly surely in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, that for the ascertainment of a single fact, the rendering of an operative judgment upon the ascertainment of a fact should be committed to two separate tribunals, each acting independently of the other, and each having a veto upon the other. By that sort of a tribunal no judicial function has ever been performed. We require unanimity in juries, that twelve men shall agree to a verdict, but they are one body; they consult and confer with each other, and they arrive at a conclusion as the result of that conference; but nobody ever proposed to have two juries to try a case. We have a court sometimes composed of an even number of judges, and the result may be a division between the judges, and there may be a provision or there may be none, for one or the other to rule the case; but it has never been that two courts having equal power can be charged with the determination of the same case.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I have found it my duty to nonconcur with the report of the committee on this bill. I have submitted these remarks not with a view of influencing the action of the Senate, for that is impossible, as they have considered the bill on former occasions, but simply to put on record my reasons for dissent to a very objectionable bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HOAR. I understood there was an agreement to treat that as the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the substitute will be treated as an original bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that I was not in the Committee on Privileges and Elections when this substitute was proposed. I have, therefore, not had time to examine it; I do not know what its provisions are, and therefore withhold my vote on the bill, not because I might not vote for it if I had made a careful examination of it, but as a member of the committee I have felt it my duty to say that I withhold my vote because I have not had time to examine the bill and ascertain what its provisions are exactly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 16th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 275) for the relief of William D. Stewart and others, heirs at law of James Stewart, deceased; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, being a revised list of papers on file in the Department of State touching the unpaid claims of citizens of the United States against France for spoliations prior to July 31, 1801.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, March 17, 1886.

REPORT OF SHIPPING INTERESTS OF GERMANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 17th of February, requesting to be furnished with a copy of the report made by the consul-general of the United States at Berlin upon the shipping interest of Germany, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State upon the subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, March 17, 1886.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also lays before the Senate a message that came from the President, but, probably by mistake, is not signed, though it comes in due official form. The Chair presents it, and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of February 9, 1886, I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with its accompanying documents, relative to the commerce between the United States and certain foreign countries in cereals and the cotton product during the years 1884 and 1885.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 16, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This message is accompanied by a large number of documents. It is not signed by the President.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the message be returned to the President to receive his signature before it is printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

LOSSES OF OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of War; which was read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 16, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, "That the Secretary of War make to the Senate a report showing the action and proceedings had to date under the act of March 3, 1885, including the claims in full as presented and as recommended for allowance, and any difference in views between the officers of the War and Treasury Departments in regard to the same."

The Department supposes that the act referred to in the resolution is chapter 335 of the laws of the Forty-eighth Congress (23 Stat., 350), which provides "for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States."

In answer thereto I forward herewith the original papers in the claims referred to and the reports and recommendations of the board of officers convened June 15, 1885, to take into consideration the proviso in the act which requires the Secretary of War to decide what articles are "reasonable, useful, necessary, and proper for such officer or soldier while in quarters engaged in public service in the line of duty."

I also forward copy of two communications of the Third Auditor of the Treasury setting forth his views upon the act, dated November 13 and December 17, 1885. Also the decision of the Second Comptroller, of January 16, 1886, that claims must first receive the action of the Secretary of War before they can be definitely acted upon by the accounting officers.

It will be seen from the papers that the claims are prepared by the claimants alone, in many cases from memory, and from their nature they can not be fully corroborated by any disinterested evidence, the only statement of the claimant that is susceptible of proof from the records of the Department being the station or locale of the officer or soldier at the time of the loss, and where Government property was lost or destroyed at the same time.

The circuitous mode by which a conclusion must be reached in any case also deserves attention. The claimants present their claims to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, who may require certain proof in support thereof. (See circular of the Third Auditor of April 25, 1885, herewith.) When the evidence is received the papers are forwarded to the Secretary of War to decide what articles are reasonable, necessary, useful, and proper, without any statement from the Auditor that the loss is proved. The action of the Auditor is in accordance with the before-mentioned decision of the Comptroller, from which it appears that the Secretary of War must perform the same duty in a claim without a particle of merit that is incumbent upon him in one of undoubted worth. The papers in the claim of S. L. Fremont, formerly lieutenant, Third United States Artillery, is an illustration of the point, and also of the extent and variety of the claims which may be presented under the act.

I have confined myself to the requirements of the resolution, in forwarding the papers therein called for, and as they are originals, I beg they may be carefully preserved and returned to this Department when no longer required by the committee.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. That report is made in response to a resolution presented by myself; and while those are original papers, they ought to be printed. It will be impossible for the Committee on Military Affairs to consider the question fairly and properly unless the documents are printed. I do not suppose they are so voluminous that it will be necessary that they should go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bundle is before the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see; but I suppose they are not very closely written and only on one side. If they go to the Printing Office they ought not to be treated as most of the manuscript that goes there is and thrown away. They ought to be returned and not destroyed. That can be done, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An order can be sent for their return.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, then, that the papers be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, when printed, that the originals be returned by the Public Printer and then returned by the Secretary of the Senate to the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 275) for the relief of William D. Stewart and others, heirs at law of James Stewart, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make a motion, not for consideration at this time but that it may be in order to-morrow. I move that the bankruptcy bill, being Senate bill 714, be made the special order for a week from Wednesday. I desire to have it stand after the bill proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I do not desire to take up this motion until after the motion of the Senator from Illinois is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand the purport of the motion, but I know the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] desires to take up the bill for the admission of Washington Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion goes over.

Mr. HOAR. I will say for the information of the Senator and the Senate that I do not propose to antagonize the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut. If he brings up the question of the admission of Washington Territory I shall give way with the bankruptcy bill until that also is disposed of. I wish merely to have the matter in position for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is entered and goes over until to-morrow.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock being nearly at hand the Chair will, with the unanimous consent of the body, lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I am aware that the question of the power of removal of officers appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is not a new question.

It was discussed in the public press of the country prior to the ratification of the Constitution by the States. The author of the Federalist interpreted the Constitution as vesting the power of removal, like that of appointment, in the President and the Senate, and so far as I have been able to ascertain there was at that time no different public interpretation of the Constitution upon the subject; and it was upon this apparently universally accepted construction that the Constitution was ratified by the States. It has been at different times, since the adoption of the Constitution, discussed in Congress. It was discussed for several days at the first Congress in connection with the establishment of the Department of State. It was again discussed in 1835 in connection with the proposed repeal of the tenure-of-office act of 1820. The report made by Hon. Garrett Davis, of the House of Representatives, in 1842, which is appended to the majority report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate at this session, and said majority report are able and comprehensive reviews of the whole question.

At the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress at which the tenure-of-office act was passed, and again in 1869, when that law was amended, it was the subject of an exhaustive discussion by the ablest members of both branches of Congress, and it has again during the debate upon the pending resolutions been ably and thoroughly discussed. I do not expect to add anything upon the question to what has been already said.

But inasmuch as the President in his recent message to the Senate contends that the power to remove officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is vested by the Constitution in the President alone, and that position is maintained by the leaders of his party in this body, and in view of the importance of the question, involving as it does the structure of the Government, and the fact that it is now before this body as a practical question, I am not disposed to let the present opportunity pass without briefly expressing my views upon it.

It will not be denied that the powers of each of the co-ordinate departments of the Federal Government are derived from the Constitution alone. If a power is not conferred by an express provision of the Constitution and is not fairly implied from some express provision and necessary to carry into effect some express power, it does not exist.

The power of the President to appoint public officers is contained in the following clause of section 2 of Article II of the Constitution

> He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.
> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

It will be perceived that while the power to nominate is absolute in the President, the power to appoint is restricted, and, unless made to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the Senate, must be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The power of the Senate to advise and consent or to withhold consent to the appointment of an officer is as absolute as the power of the President to nominate. The removal from an office created by law necessarily involves the appointment of some person to fill it, and removals from office are made almost entirely by the appointment of another person to the office. This method of removal appears to have been the only one contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, and hence no express provision was made upon the subject. It will not be claimed that there is any express provision in the Constitution conferring upon the President alone the power of removal from office. Such a power, if it is to be found, is an implied power. That is to say, it must appear by necessary implication that the power of removal by the President alone is necessary to carry into effect some express power conferred upon him. I do not find in the Constitution any warrant for such a construction. The reasonable and general rule upon the subject of appointments to and removals from office is that they are united, that the one is the counterpart of and coextensive with the other.

In my judgment the power of appointment and removal of officers who under the Constitution and laws are appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate are inseparable. An office once created by the action of Congress and the approval of the President can not be destroyed without the concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress. The President can not appoint one of the four thousand civil officers, or of the officers of the Army and Navy required to be confirmed by the Senate, without the concurrent action of that body.

If the power of appointment and removal are separable, and the power of removal is vested in the President alone, the continuance of the Government as an organized society depends upon the pleasure of the President. In an hour by the stroke of a pen he could virtually destroy the whole official fabric, and having destroyed it he would be powerless to reconstruct it.

The right and power of the Senate to consent or withhold its consent to the removal of Federal officers in my judgment does not depend upon the tenure-of-office act. It is a constitutional power, and applies to those officers confirmed by the Senate whose terms of office are not fixed by law as well as to those who hold for fixed terms. The power of the Senate in the matter is coextensive with the power of the President. The President has an unrestricted power to nominate; the Senate has an absolute power under the Constitution to advise and consent or to withhold its consent. The power to suspend an officer for sufficient cause during the recess of the Senate as a matter of public convenience or necessity is now conferred by law upon the President, but an officer suspended is restored to office by operation of law unless the Senate consents to his removal.

When this question arose in the Senate at the present session of Congress, not being familiar with the legislative and judicial constructions which had been placed upon the Constitution concerning it I examined it so far as I was able and became convinced that under the Constitution the power of removal of officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is vested in the President and the Senate, and not in the President alone, and that the tenure-of-office act as amended in 1869, now sections 1767, 1768, and 1769 of the Revised Statutes, so far as it relates to the removal of such officers, is but declaratory of the constitutional rule upon the subject.

I do not intend to enter into an argument in support of this construction at this time. I prefer to quote from the speeches of others and to adopt as my own arguments which ought to carry conviction on account of their own weight as well as on account of the acknowledged ability of those who made them, and to which I could not add and from which I would not subtract.

That eminent statesman and able lawyer, Daniel Webster, whose exposition of the Constitution in relation to the respective powers of the Federal and State Governments was accepted by the people of the North, maintained by the armies of the Union upon many a battlefield and determined to be correct by the arbitrament of the sword, in a speech made in the Senate in 1835 upon the bill to repeal the act of 1820 fixing the terms of certain officers, discussed this power of removal in his usual able, lucid, and forcible manner. To my mind, his arguments upon that occasion in favor of the proposition that the power of removal is vested by the Constitution in the President and the Senate are unanswerable. I do not see how any mind unembarrassed by precedents and unbiased by prejudice can fail to be convinced of the soundness of his arguments. Mr. Webster said:

> It appears to me, however, after thorough and repeated and conscientious examination, that an erroneous interpretation was given to the Constitution in this respect, by the decision of the First Congress; and I will ask leave to state, shortly, the reasons for that opinion, although there is nothing in this bill which proposes to disturb that decision.
> The Constitution nowhere says one word of the power of removal from office, except in the case of conviction on impeachment. Wherever the power exists, therefore, except in cases of impeachment, it must exist as a constructive or incidental power. If it exists in the President alone, it must exist in him because it is attached to something else, or included in something else, or results from something else, which is granted to the President. There is certainly no specific grant; it is a power, therefore, the existence of which if proved at all is to be proved by inference and argument. In the only instance in which the Constitution speaks of removal from office, as I have already said, it speaks of it as the exercise of judicial power; that is to say, it speaks of it as one part of the judgment of the Senate in cases of conviction on impeachment. No other mention is made in the whole instrument of any power of removal. Whence, then, is the power derived to the President?
> It is usually said by those who maintain its existence in the single hands of the President, that the power is derived from that clause of the Constitution which says: "The executive power shall be in a President." The power of removal, they argue, is, in its nature, an executive power; and, as the executive power is thus vested in the President, the power of removal is necessarily included.
> It is true that the Constitution declares that the executive power shall be vested in the President; but the first question which then arises is, What is executive power? What is the degree, and what are the limitations? Executive power is not a thing so well known, and so accurately defined, as that the written constitution of a limited government can be supposed to have conferred it in the lump. What is executive power? What are its boundaries? What model or example had the framers of the Constitution in their minds when they spoke of "executive power?" Did they mean executive power as known in England, or as known in France, or as known in Russia? Did they take it as defined by Montesquieu, by Burlamaqui, or by De Lolme? All these differ from one another as to the extent of the executive power of government. What, then, was intended by "the executive power?" Now, sir, I think it perfectly plain and manifest, that, although the framers of the Constitution meant to confer executive power on the President, yet they meant to define and limit that power, and to confer no more than they did thus define and limit. When they say it shall be vested in a President, they mean that one magistrate, to be called a President, shall hold the executive authority; but they mean, further, that he shall hold this authority according to the grants and limitations of the Constitution itself.
> They did not intend, certainly, a sweeping gift of prerogative. They did not intend to grant to the President whatever might be construed, or supposed, or imagined to be executive power; and the proof that they meant no such thing is, that immediately after using these general words they proceed specifically to enumerate his several distinct and particular authorities; to fix and define them; to give the Senate an essential control over the exercise of some of them, and to leave others uncontrolled. By the executive power conferred on the President, the Constitution means no more than that portion which itself creates, and which it qualifies, limits, and circumscribes.
> A general survey of the frame of the Constitution will satisfy us of this. That instrument goes all along upon the idea of dividing the powers of Government, so far as practicable, into three great departments. It describes the powers and duties of these departments in an article allotted to each. As first in importance and dignity it begins with the legislative department. The first article of the Constitution, therefore, commences with the declaration that "all legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The article goes on to prescribe the manner in which Congress is to be constituted and organized, and then proceeds to enumerate specifically the powers intended to be granted, and adds the general clause conferring such authority as may be necessary to carry granted powers into effect. Now, sir, no man doubts that this is a limited Legislature; that it possesses no powers but such as are granted by express words or necessary implication, and that it would be quite preposterous to insist that Congress possesses any particular legislative power, merely because it is in its nature a legislative body, if no grant can be found for it in the Constitution itself.

Then comes, sir, the second article, creating an executive power; and it declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States." After providing for the mode of choosing him, it immediately proceeds to enumerate, specifically, the powers which he shall possess and exercise, and the duties which he shall perform. I consider the language of this article, therefore, percisely analogous to that in which the Legislature is created; that is to say, I understand the Constitution as saying that "the executive power herein granted shall be vested in a President of the United States."

In like manner the third article, or that which is intended to arrange the judicial system, begins by declaring that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." But these general words do not show what extent of judicial power is vested in the courts of the United States. All that is left to be done, and is done, in the following sections, by express and well-guarded provisions.

I think, therefore, sir, that very great caution is to be used, and the ground well considered, before we admit that the President derives any distinct and specific power from those general words which vest the executive authority in him. The Constitution itself does not rest satisfied with these general words. It immediately goes into particulars, and carefully enumerates the several authorities which the President shall possess. The very first of the enumerated powers is the command of the Army and Navy. This, most certainly, is an executive power. And why is it particularly set down and expressed, if any power was intended to be granted under the general words? This would pass, if anything would pass, under those words. But enumeration, specification, particularization was evidently the design of the framers of the Constitution, in this as in other parts of it. I do not, therefore, regard the declaration that the executive power shall be vested in a President as being any grant at all, any more than the declaration that the legislative power shall be vested in Congress constitutes, by itself, a grant of such power. In the one case, as in the other, I think the object was to describe and denominate the department, which should hold, respectively, the legislative and the executive authority; very much as we see, in some of the State constitutions, that the several articles are headed with the titles "legislative power," "executive power," "judicial power;" and this entitling of the articles with the name of the power has never been supposed, of itself, to confer any authority whatever. It amounts to no more than naming the departments.

If, then, the power of removal be admitted to be an executive power, still it must be sought for and found among the enumerated executive powers, or fairly implied from some one or more of them. It can not be implied from the general words. The power of appointment was not left to be so implied; why, then, should the power of removal have been so left? They are both closely connected; one is indispensable to the other; why, then, was one carefully expressed, defined, and limited, and not one word said about the other?

Sir, I think the whole matter is sufficiently plain. Nothing is said in the Constitution about the power of removal, because it is not a separate and distinct power. It is part of the power of appointment, naturally going with it or necessarily resulting from it. The Constitution or the laws may separate these powers, it is true, in a particular case, as is done in respect to the judges, who, though appointed by the President and Senate, can not be removed at the pleasure of either or of both. So a statute, in prescribing the tenure of any other office, may place the officer beyond the reach of the appointing power. But when no other tenure is prescribed, and officers hold their places at will, that will is necessarily the will of the appointing power; because the exercise of the power of appointment at once displaces such officers. The power of placing one man in office necessarily implies the power of turning another out. If one man be Secretary of State, and another be appointed, the first goes out by the mere force of the appointment of the other, without any previous act of removal whatever. And this is the practice of the Government, and has been from the first. In all the removals which have been made, they have generally been effected simply by making other appointments. I can not find a case to the contrary. There is no such thing as any distinct official act of removal. I have looked into the practice, and caused inquiries to be made in the Departments, and I do not learn that any such proceeding is known as an entry or record of the removal of an officer from office; and the President could only act, in such cases, by causing some proper record or entry to be made, as proof of the fact of removal. I am aware that there have been some cases in which notice has been sent to persons in office that their services are, or will be, after a given day, dispensed with.

These are usually cases in which the object is, not to inform the incumbent that he is removed, but to tell him that a successor either is, or by a day named will be, appointed. If there be any instances in which such notice is given without express reference to the appointment of a successor they are few, and even in these such reference must be implied, because in no case is there any distinct official act of removal, that I can find, unconnected with the act of appointment. At any rate, it is the usual practice, and has been from the first, to consider the appointment as producing the removal of the previous incumbent. When the President desires to remove a person from office he sends a message to the Senate nominating some other person. The message usually runs in this form: "I nominate A B to be collector of the customs, &c., in the place of C D removed." If the Senate advise and consent to the nomination C D is effectually out of office and A B is in his place. The same effect would be produced if the message should say nothing of any removal. Suppose A B to be Secretary of State and the President to send us a message saying merely, "I nominate C D to be Secretary of State." If we confirm this nomination C D becomes Secretary of State and A B is necessarily removed.

I have gone into these details and particulars, sir, for the purpose of showing that, not only in the nature of things, but also according to the practice of the Government, the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment. It belongs to it, is attached to it, forms a part of it, or results from it.

If this is true, the inference is manifest. If the power of removal, when not otherwise regulated by Constitution or law, be part and parcel of the power of appointment, or a necessary incident to it, then whoever holds the power of appointment holds also the power of removal. But it is the President and the Senate, and not the President alone, who hold the power of appointment; and therefore, according to the true construction of the Constitution, it should be the President and Senate, and not the President alone, who holds the power of removal.

The decision of 1789 has been followed by a very strange and indefensible anomaly, showing that it does not rest on any just principle. The natural connection between the appointing power and the removing power has, as I have already stated, always led the President to bring about a removal by the process of a new appointment. This is quite efficient for his purpose, when the Senate confirms the new nomination. One man is turned out, and another put in. But the Senate sometimes rejects the new nomination; and what then becomes of the old incumbent? Is he out of office or is he still in? He has not been turned out by any exercise of the power of appointment, for no appointment has been made. That power has not been exercised. He has not been removed by any distinct and separate act of removal, for no such act has been performed or attempted. Is he still in, then, or is he out? Where is he? In this dilemma, sir, those who maintain the power of removal as existing in the President alone are driven to what seems to me very near absurdity. The incumbent has not been removed by the appointing power, since the appointing power has not been exercised. He has not been removed by any distinct and independent act of removal, since no such act has been performed.

They are forced to the necessity, therefore, of contending that the removal has been accomplished by the mere nomination of a successor; so that the removing power is made incident not to the appointing power, but to one part of it; that is, to the nominating power. The nomination, not having been assented to by the Senate, it is clear, has failed at the first step in the process of appointment. But though thus rendered null and void in its main object as the first process in making an appointment, it is held to be good and valid nevertheless to bring about that which results from an appointment; that is, the removal of the person actually in office. In other words, the nomination produces the consequences of an appointment, or some of them, though it be itself no appointment and effect no appointment. This, sir, appears to me to be anything but sound reasoning and just construction.

But this is not all. The President has sometimes sent us a nomination to an office already filled, and before we have acted upon it has seen fit to withdraw it. What is the effect of such a nomination? If a nomination, merely as such, turns out the present incumbent, then he is out, let what will become afterward of the nomination. But I believe the President has acted upon the idea that a nomination made and at any time afterward withdrawn does not remove the actual incumbent.

Sir, even this is not the end of the inconsistency into which the prevailing doctrine has led. There have been cases in which nominations to offices already filled have come to the Senate, remained here for weeks or months, the incumbents all the while continuing to discharge their official duties, and relinquishing their offices only when the nominations of their successors have been confirmed and commissions issued to them; so that, if a nomination be confirmed, the nomination itself makes no removal; the removal then waits to be brought about by the appointment. But if the nomination be rejected, then the nomination itself, it is contended, has effected the removal. Who can defend opinions which lead to such results?

These reasons, sir, incline me strongly to the opinion that, upon a just construction of the Constitution, the power of removal is part of, or a necessary result from, the power of appointment, and, therefore, that it ought to have been exercised by the Senate concurrently with the President.

At the same session of Congress another distinguished statesman and profound student of the Constitution, John C. Calhoun, taking up the examination of the question, biased in favor of the doctrine of the absolute power of the President to make removals from office, but finding no express or implied authority in the Constitution to warrant such a doctrine, became convinced that the so-called legislative construction by the first Congress had been erroneous, and ably advocated the power of Congress to restrict executive patronage. I quote briefly from a speech made by him in the Senate upon the bill to repeal the act of 1820:

Mr. Calhoun said: The question involved in the third section of the bill, whether the power to dismiss an officer of the Government can be controlled and regulated by Congress, or is under the exclusive and unlimited control of the President, is no ordinary question, which may be decided either way without materially affecting the character and practical operation of the Government. It is, on the contrary, a great and fundamental question, on the decision of which will materially depend the fact whether this Government shall prove to be what those who framed it supposed it was—a free, popular, and republican Government, or a monarchy in disguise.

If the power to dismiss is possessed by the Executive, he must hold it in one of two modes, either by an express grant of the power in the Constitution, or as a power necessary and proper to execute some power expressly granted by that instrument. All the powers under the Constitution may be classed under one or the other of these heads; there is no intermediate class. The first question then, is, has the President the power in question by any express grant in the Constitution? He who affirms he has, is bound to show it. That instrument is in the hands of every member; the portion containing the delegation of power to the President is short. It is comprised in a few sentences. I ask Senators to open the Constitution, to examine it, and to find, if they can, any authority given to the President to dismiss a public officer. None such can be found; the Constitution has been carefully examined, and no one pretends to have found such a grant. Well, then, as there is none such, if it exists at all, it must exist as a power necessary and proper to execute some granted power; but, if it exists in that character, it belongs to Congress and not to the Executive. I venture not this assertion hastily; I speak on the authority of the Constitution itself—an express and unequivocal authority which can not be denied or contradicted. Hear what that sacred instrument says:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers (those granted to Congress itself), and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Mark the fullness the expression. Congress shall have power to make all laws, not only to carry into effect the powers expressly delegated to itself, but those delegated to the Government, or any department or officer thereof; comprehending, of course, the power to pass laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers expressly granted to the executive department. It follows that, to whatever express grant of power to the Executive the power of dismissal may be supposed to attach; whether to that of seeing the laws faithfully executed, or to the still more comprehensive grant, as contended for by some, vesting executive powers in the President, the mere fact that it is a power appurtenant to another power, and necessary to carry it into effect, transfers it, by the provisions of the Constitution cited, from the Executive to Congress, and places it under its control, to be regulated in the manner which it may judge best. If there be truth in reasoning on political subjects, the conclusion at which I have arrived can not be resisted. I would entreat gentlemen who are opposed to me (said Mr. C.) to pause and reflect; and to point out, if possible, the slightest flaw in the argument, or to find a peg on which to hang a doubt. Can they deny that all powers under the Constitution are either powers specifically granted, or powers necessary and proper to carry such into execution? Can it be said that there are inherent powers comprehended in neither of these classes, and existing by a sort of divine right in the Government? The Senator from New York [Mr. Wright] attempted to establish some such position; but the moment my colleague touched it with the spear of truth, he, Mr. W., shrunk from the deformity of his own conception. Or can it be asserted that there are powers derived from obligations higher than the Constitution itself? The very intimation of such a source of power hurled from office the predecessor of the present incumbent. But if it can not be denied that all the powers under the Constitution are comprised under one or the other of these classes, and if it is acknowledged, as it is on all sides, that the power of dismissal is not specifically granted by the Constitution, it follows by an irresistible and necessary consequence, that the power belongs not to the Executive, but to Congress, to be regulated and controlled at its pleasure.

Another no less distinguished statesman, one whose eloquence was only surpassed by his patriotism, who was beloved by his party as no other party leader has been in this country, who for almost half a century was a central figure in the political history of the United States, and who is reputed to have declared, after an unsuccessful race for the Presidency, "I would rather be right than to be President," Kentucky's favorite son, Henry Clay, during the same session said:

Mr. Clay rose and said he held in his hand four resolutions which he wished to present, and which he was desirous should be considered at no very distant day. They presented subjects of grave inquiry and of deep importance, involving the purity of the administration, if not the very durability of the Government. The three first resolutions assumed that the Constitution gave no power of removal from office by the President of the United States at his pleasure. He was fully aware that this power was conceded to the President by the first Congress which sat under the Constitution. But since that period, except in an incidental discussion here four or five years ago, it has never been discussed in Congress. He had carefully looked into the Constitution, as it related to the power of removal in the President, and the result was that the power was not reposed in the President in the instance indicated in the resolutions. He believed the assertion of the power by the First Congress was improvident, and not the least reason for this opinion was the confidence which that Congress reposed in the wisdom, the prudence, and the patriotism of the first President—the Father of his Country. And as to the precedent, the fact was worthy of consideration; and, while he conceded that it was made, he contended that it was made with qualifications which have been utterly disregarded by this administration.

The doctrines of this administration, and the principles of its supporters, as avowed in the discussion upon the deposit question, are that all persons are bound to conform to the will of the President, no matter how opposite that will may be to their own opinion and judgment. The total number of employés under the Government is estimated to be at least 40,000; and, if we look at the Blue Book, where only a portion of them are registered, the estimate will be found to be much below the true mark. If we suppose that this mass of 40,000 officers are actuated by one spirit, governed by one impulse, and by one mind, it would not be difficult to anticipate that the day was not far distant when the efforts of the people to restrain this enormous power would be vain and unavailing. It was a settled axiom in free governments that a standing army was dangerous in time of peace. That is, such an army as, being distinguished by their dress from the rest of the community, was capable of being seen and estimated.

But how different from this was this army of forty thousand men, dispersed over the whole country and obeying one common impulse, ready to rally round and carry into effect the purposes and objects of the Government, and how much more dangerous than that army against which the fears of the people have been directed. And the time would come when, if it was not soon checked, it would as certainly decide the succession to the Presidential chair as the pretorian band of ancient Rome decided on the disposition of the imperial crown. He hoped gentlemen would soon turn their attention to the subject seriously, examine the Constitution carefully, and not intrench themselves behind one solitary precedent; he admitted the force of precedent: it was entitled to respect, but yet it was only evidence.

He therefore invoked gentlemen to point out the part or parts of the Constitution which gave to the Chief Magistrate the power contended for. He had looked for it in vain. The effect of the plan indicated by the resolutions was to secure the independence of the officer, to place him less under the control of one man, to restore that equilibrium in the Government which was wanting, and which, if permitted to go on, would lead to the total absorption of the powers of government by one head, to the exclusion of all other departments. He was guided in this movement by considerations of public good, and he looked to the operations of government, and its effects upon the institutions of the country. He submitted the resolutions, moved that they be printed, and made the order of the day for the first Monday in April.

1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States does not vest in the President power to remove, at his pleasure, officers under the Government of the United States, where offices have been established by law.

2. Resolved, That in all cases of offices created by law, the tenure of holding which is not prescribed by the Constitution, Congress is authorized by the Constitution to prescribe the tenure, terms, and conditions on which they are to be holden.

3. Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that in all instances of appointment to office by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, other than diplomatic appointments, the power of removal shall be exercised only in concurrence with the Senate; and when the Senate is not in session that the President may suspend any such officer, communicating his reasons for the suspension to the Senate at its first succeeding session; and if the Senate concur with him, the officer shall be removed; but if it do not concur with him, the officer shall be restored to office.

4. Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of all deputy postmasters whose annual emolument exceeds a prescribed limit.

Citations of like character might be given in great numbers from the speeches of the most eminent statesmen made during the debates in the First Congress, and in 1835, 1867, and 1869, and from official reports and public documents; but those already made will answer my present purpose, which is only to present the arguments in favor of that construction of the Constitution which vests the power of removal in the President and Senate. This question is not to be decided upon the preponderance of the opinions of statesmen, however eminent, of any party or any age. It is a judicial question, and whenever it comes before the courts for determination must be decided according to the usual rules of constitutional construction.

I have said that the authors of the Federalist ably maintained that under the Constitution the power of removal was vested in the President and the Senate. I hold in my hand a copy of the Federalist, and read from Letter No. 75, which it is believed, and probably upon good evidence, was written by Mr. Hamilton. He says:

It has been observed in a former paper that "the true test of a good government is its aptitude and tendency to produce a good administration." If the justness of this observation be admitted the mode of appointing the officers of the United States contained in the foregoing clauses must, when examined, be allowed to be entitled to particular commendation. It is not easy to conceive a plan better calculated than this to promote a judicious choice of men for filling the offices of the Union, and it will not need proof that on this point must essentially depend the character of its administration.

And in the same letter I find:

To what purpose then require the co-operation of the Senate? I answer, that the necessity of their concurrence would have a powerful, though in general a silent operation. It would be an excellent check upon a spirit of favoritism in the President, and would tend greatly to preventing the appointment of unfit characters from State prejudice, from family connection, from personal attachment, or from a view to popularity. In addition to this, it would be an efficacious source of stability in the administration.

I quote now from article No. 76, also written by Mr. Hamilton:

It has been mentioned as one of the advantages to be expected from the co-operation of the Senate, in the business of appointments, that it would contribute to the stability of the administration. The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint. A change of the Chief Magistrate, therefore, would not occasion so violent or so general a revolution in the officers of the Government as might be expected, if he were the sole disposer of offices. Where a man in any station had given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him, by the apprehension that a discontinuance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt, and bring some degree of discredit upon himself. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration will be most disposed to prize a provision, which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body, which, from the greater permanency of its own composition, will in all probability be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government.

To this union of the Senate with the President in the article of appointments it has in some cases been suggested that it would serve to give the President an undue influence over the Senate, and in others that it would have an opposite tendency, a strong proof that neither suggestion is true.

To state the first in its proper form is to refute it. It amounts to this: The President would have an improper influence over the Senate, because the Senate would have the power of restraining him. This is an absurdity in terms. It can not admit of a doubt that the entire power of appointment would enable him much more effectually to establish a dangerous empire over that body than a mere power of nomination subject to their control.

Let us take a view of the converse of the proposition: "The Senate would influence the Executive." As I have had occasion to remark in several other instances, the indistinctness of the objection forbids a precise answer. In what manner is this influence to be exerted? In relation to what objects? The power of influencing a person, in the sense in which it is here used, must imply a power of conferring a benefit upon him. How could the Senate confer a benefit upon the President by the manner of employing their right of negative upon his nominations? If it be said they might sometimes gratify him by an acquiescence in a favorite choice, when public motives might dictate a different conduct, I answer that the instances in which the President could be personally interested in the result would be too few to admit of his being materially affected by the compliances of the Senate. The power which can originate the disposition of honors and emoluments is more likely to attract than to be attracted by the power which can merely obstruct their course. If by influencing the President be meant restraining him, this is precisely what must have been intended. And it has been shown that the restraint would be salutary, at the same time that it would not be such as to destroy a single advantage to be looked for from the uncontrolled agency of that Magistrate. The right of nomination would produce all the good of that of appointment and would in a great measure avoid its evils.

The advocates of the exclusive executive power of removal say "this question has been settled by legislative construction," and we are referred to the act passed by the First Congress to create the Department of Foreign Affairs for such construction.

I will, at the risk of repeating some things which have been said by others during this debate, briefly examine this legislative construction.

At the First Congress, and on June 16, 1789, the House of Representatives resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the bill for establishing an executive department to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs. The first clause of the bill, after recapitulating the title of the officer and his duties, contained the following words: "to be removable from office by the President of the United States." This clause gave rise to a discussion which extended until the 24th of June, when the bill, having been amended, passed the House. In that discussion it was ably contended by Mr. White, of Virginia, and others that the clause was unconstitutional; that the Constitution having vested the power of appointment in the President and the Senate the power of appointment to and dismissal from office were necessarily united in their natures, and therefore the power of removal was vested by the Constitution in the President and the Senate.

It was contended by others that an officer appointed by the President and Senate could be removed only by impeachment. It was contended by Mr. Madison, and his opinion was shared in by the majority of the House, that the power of removal under the Constitution was in the President alone, but the power was not claimed by Mr. Madison to be a power to remove an officer at pleasure. He contended substantially that the power of removal could only be legitimately exercised for cause, and would not enable the President to retain an unworthy man in office, because if an unworthy man should be continued in office by an unworthy President the House of Representatives could impeach him and the Senate remove him, and he also contended that it would be maladministration and an impeachable offense for the President to displace from office a man whose merits required that he should be continued in it.

Upon this subject I ask the Secretary to read the portion which I have marked of a speech made by Mr. Madison in the House of Representatives upon the bill referred to on the 17th day of June, 1789.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is to be remarked that the power in this case will not consist so much in continuing a bad man in office as in the danger of displacing a good one. Perhaps the great danger, as has been observed, of abuse in the executive power lies in the improper continuance of bad men in office. But the power we contend for will not enable him to do this, for if an unworthy man be continued in office by an unworthy President the House of Representatives can at any time impeach him, and the Senate can remove him whether the President chooses or not.

The danger then consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House, before the Senate for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. But what can be his motives for displacing a worthy man? It must be that he may fill the place with an unworthy creature of his own. Can he accomplish this end? No; he can place no man in the vacancy whom the Senate shall not approve; and if he could fill the vacancy with the man he might choose, I am sure he would have little inducement to make an improper removal. Let us consider the consequences. The injured man will be supported by the popular opinion; the community will take side with him against the President; it will facilitate those combinations, and give success to those exertions which will be pursued to prevent his re-election. To displace a man of high merit, and who from his station may be supposed a man of extensive influence are considerations in the mind of any man who may fill the Presidential chair. The friends of those individuals and the public sympathy will be against him. If this should not produce his impeachment before the Senate, it will amount to an impeachment before the community, who will have the power of punishment by refusing to re-elect him.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill was finally amended by striking out the clause "to be removable by the President," and by amending the second section, which provided that there should be a chief clerk, to be appointed by the secretary of foreign affairs, and who, in case of vacancy, should have charge and custody of all records, &c., so as to provide that whenever the said principal officers should be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, such chief clerk should have charge and custody of all records, &c., which language, it was understood, implied the existence of the power of removal by the President. Thus amended the bill passed the House June 24, 1789, by a vote of 29 yeas to 22 nays, a majority of 7. The deliberations of the Senate at the first session of Congress were had with closed doors, and the debates were not reported. The bill passed the Senate July 18, 1789, by the casting vote of the Vice-President, the Senate being equally divided.

The passage of the bill in that shape was, as Judge Story substantially says in his Commentaries, in a large measure due to the exalted character of the first Chief Magistrate and the confidence of the people in his patriotism and integrity. This legislative construction grew out of a supposed public necessity, and the power of removal by the President was understood to be restricted to removals for cause rendering the same necessary for the protection of the public interests. It was not at that early day for a moment contended by any one that the power of removal was coextensive with the executive will, governed by no law, dependent upon no necessity, to be exercised without question, without responsibility, and without re-examination.

Whatever value attaches to the action of the First Congress upon this subject the advocates of the absolute power of removal in the President are entitled to; but it amounts only to this, that the majority of the House of Representatives and one-half the Senators of the First Congress held to that opinion. The fact that Congress for a number of years had no occasion to change that construction is entitled to but little weight.

It will not be contended that a legislative construction of the Constitution by one Congress is binding on another Congress. A conclusive construction of the Constitution and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof can only be made by the department of the Government intrusted with the judicial powers. If legislative construction makes the law of the case, then, as we shall presently see, the law is at present, and has been for more than twenty years, settled in favor of the construction of the Constitution which confers upon the President and the Senate the power to remove officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The next Congressional legislation that I am aware of, which is important to be considered in this connection, was the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stats., 582), entitled: "An act to limit the term of office of certain officials therein named and for other purposes." Section 1 of that act was as follows:

SEC. 1. That from and after the passage of this act all district attorneys, collectors of customs, naval agents, receivers of public moneys for lands, registers of land offices, paymasters of the Army, the apothecary-general, the assistant apothecary-general, and the commissary-general of purchases, to be appointed under the laws of the United States, shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure.

Section 2 provided the times at which the commissions of officers named in the first section of the act then in office, unless vacated by removal from office or other cause, should cease and expire. It was during a debate in the Senate upon a bill to repeal this act that Webster and Calhoun made the speeches from which I have quoted.

It will be observed that while the officers named in the first section of the act were removable from office at pleasure, it was not stated whether it was at the pleasure of the President alone, or at the pleasure of the President and Senate. Under the act, however, the President exercised the power of removal.

By the act of June 3, 1864, entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," it was provided in a section of the act still in force and now section 325 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

The Comptroller of the Currency shall be appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years unless sooner removed by the President upon reasons to be communicated to the Senate.

This act, which has been the law of the land for nearly twenty-two years, is inconsistent with the existence of an absolute power of removal in the President, and is a distinct assertion of the power of Congress to require the President to communicate to the Senate his reasons for the removal of an officer. It was passed during President Lincoln's administration.

The seventeenth section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862 (12 Stats., 596), provides that—

The President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and requested to dismiss and discharge from the military service, either in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or volunteer force, any officer, for any cause, which in his judgment either renders such officer unsuitable for or whose dismission would promote the public service.

Here it will be seen, that Congress authorized, during the war of the rebellion, the President to remove certain officers of the Army and Navy.

This act was also passed during President Lincoln's administration, and appears to have been a war measure. It is inconsistent with the proposition that the President had already, under the Constitution, the power of removal of such officers.

The act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stats., 489), provides that in case any officer of the military or naval service thereafter dismissed by the authority of the President shall make application in writing for a trial, setting forth under oath that he has been wrongfully and unjustly dismissed, "the President shall, as soon as the necessities of the service may permit, convene a court-martial to try such officer on the charges on which he was dismissed, and if such court-martial shall not award dismissal or death as the punishment of such officer, the order of dismissal shall be void. And if the court-martial aforesaid shall not be convened for the trial of such officer within six months from the presentation of his application for trial, the sentence of dismissal shall be void."

The fifth section of the Army appropriation act of July 17, 1866, contained the following clause:

And no officer in the military or naval service shall in time of peace be dismissed from the service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect or in commutation thereof.

By the first of these acts Congress provided for an appeal from the action of the President in dismissing an officer of the Army or Navy to a tribunal having power to reverse and nullify the action of the President, and by the second it undertook to prevent the removal of such officers by the President except in the execution of the judgment of a court-martial.

There is no distinction possible between officers of the Army and Navy and civil officers, so far as the power of removal is concerned.

And it will be observed that the first act, which was a far greater interference with the exercise by the President of the power of removal than the tenure-of-office act of 1867, was passed during President Lincoln's administration.

Upon the proposition that there is no distinction under the Constitution as to the power of removal of an officer of the Army and Navy and the power of removal of a civil officer, the Lansing case, in the sixth volume of Opinions of Attorneys-General, is in point. The opinion is by Attorney-General Cushing. He says:

I am not aware of any ground of distinction in this respect, so far as regards the strict question of the law, between officers of the Army and any other officers of the Government.

Then he says again:

I observe only that, so far as regards the question of abstract power, I know of nothing essential in the grounds of legal conclusion which have been so thoroughly explored at different times in respect of civil officers, which does not apply to officers of the Army.

The tenure-of-office act of March 2, 1867, amended in 1869 (now sections 1767, 1768, and 1769 of the Revised Statutes), was a deliberate legislative construction of the Constitution upon the power of removal. The vote by which it passed, and the utterances of the leading members of both Houses of Congress concerning it show that the legislative construction of the First Congress has been deliberately reversed. The bill passed the House over President Johnson's veto March 2, 1867, by a vote of 133 yeas to 13 nays, not voting 21, and passed the Senate the same day by a vote of 35 yeas to 11 nays. The first section as amended in 1869, now section 1767 of the Revised Statutes, provides that—

Every person holding any civil office to which he has been, or hereafter may be, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment with the like advice and consent of a successor in his place except as herein otherwise provided.

By a section of said act, now section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, the President is authorized during the recess of the Senate at his discretion to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the courts of the United States, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person to perform the duties of the office in the mean time, and is required within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate to nominate persons in the place of all officers suspended; and it is provided that if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person at the same session of the Senate for the office.

And by section 1769 the President is authorized to fill vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death or resignation or expiration of term of office by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session thereafter. And it is provided that if no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is made to fill an office so temporarily filled by the President during the next session of the Senate the office shall remain in abeyance.

Nothing could be more positive or certain than this law. By these several sections no officer embraced within their provisions is to be removed unless the Senate advises the President to make the removal. The President may appoint a person to fill a vacancy during the recess of the Senate who is to hold only until the adjournment of the next session of the Senate, when, if the Senate has not advised and consented to an appointment to fill the office, the office is to remain vacant, and the President has no power to make a further appointment. The President may suspend an officer during the recess of the Senate and designate some person to perform the duties of the office, who is to hold until the close of the next session of the Senate, but the President is required to report the suspension to the Senate and to nominate a person to fill the place within thirty days after the Senate meets. The Senate is thus required to advise the President to remove the old officer and to appoint a new one. If the Senate refuses to advise the President to appoint the person nominated, he may nominate another person during the session.

If the Senate refuses to advise the President to remove the old officer he is ipse facto restored to the office when the Senate adjourns. He may maintain an appropriate legal proceeding for the recovery of the possession of the office and the salary and emoluments attached thereto, and it appears to me that from these several provisions an implication arises that an officer so restored to office shall not again be suspended for the same cause.

It was contended by the junior Senator from West Virginia in his very able speech on Friday last, if I understood his argument correctly, that the act of 1869 repealed the act of 1867 so far as that act restricted the removal of Federal officers by the President alone. I have a good opinion of the legal acumen of that Senator, and I do not believe that anything but the pressure of a supposed political necessity would have so warped his judgment and have elicited from him such an opinion. In my opinion the Senate ought to be governed by the act of 1869, for, although, if I thought that by that act the President alone was authorized to remove officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, I should be compelled to believe the act unconstitutional, because an interference with the constitutional powers of the Senate, I myself should nevertheless be governed by it until it was repealed or declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. But such is not the intent or meaning of the act.

The trouble with the Senator's argument appears to me to be that he does not distinguish between a suspension and a removal. He says:

> The President suspends an officer until the end of the next session of the Senate. He makes a nomination to succeed him. You approve or disapprove it. You may put it on the ground that you reject his proposition to suspend the officer. You are estopped to raise that question. That man is suspended until the end of the next session of the Senate. The moment it ends what matter to you or me whether by operation of law the suspended officer gets back or not? By an act of the President, his mere signature, he gets out again.

If all this is admitted, still the power of the President is a power to suspend only. He may abuse that power intrusted to him to be exercised in proper cases during the recess of the Senate where the interests of the public service requires its exercise and use it to promote the personal fortunes of his friends and the interests of his party, but the power, nevertheless, is only a power to suspend. The definition of the term is "temporary delay, interruption, or cessation." I understand it to be admitted by the Senator that if the officer suspended is not removed by the appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of another person to fill the office, the suspended officer is restored to the office.

If the argument were that because the President can, in the opinion of the Senator, under this law suspend an officer, so restored to office, a second time, the Senate will do a profitless thing to refuse to advise and consent to the removal of the suspended officer, there would be some force in it. But when it is contended that for this reason the advice and consent of the Senate is not necessary to the removal of such an officer, the fallacy of the argument is apparent. The conclusion of the Senator does not follow from his premise. The practical effect of the law if abused by the Executive is one thing, the power of the Senate under it, upon which the right of the present controversy to some extent depends, is another. That an officer suspended under the provisions of the act of 1869 is restored to office if the Senate does not see fit to advise and consent to the appointment of another person in his place, as was stated by the junior Senator from Iowa, was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Embrey vs. The United States, 100 United States Reports.

Embrey was suspended from office by the President after the passage of the act of 1869. The Senate refused to advise and consent to the appointment of another person in his place, and the Supreme Court say, "consequently, on the 15th of July, 1870, when the next session of the Senate ended, he became entitled to enter again on the performance of the duties which pertained to his office."

Embrey, therefore, although suspended under the act of 1869, was not removed because the Senate did not consent to his removal, and he was restored to office under the operation of the act.

There have been some decisions of the Federal courts bearing upon this question of the power of removal.

In Ex parte Hennen, 13 Peters, the Supreme Court of the United States laid down the doctrine that "in the absence of all constitutional provisions or statutory regulations it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment.

The senior Senator from Texas in his speech on yesterday quoted from this case the following:

> The power of removal from office was a subject much disputed, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate; and the great question was, whether the removal was to be by the President alone, or with the concurrence of the Senate, both constituting the appointing power.
> But it was very early adopted, as the practical construction of the Constitution, that this power was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution.

This was said in January, 1839, and was strictly true as a historical recital. The practice had been up to that time for the President to make removals. The First Congress, as all have seen, had placed such a construction upon the Constitution. But in this very case the Supreme Court decided that as the power to appoint Hennen clerk of the United States district court had been conferred by law upon the district judge, and as no express provision had been made for removal, the power of removal also was as an incident to the power of appointment vested in such judge, and the practice then in vogue of removals by the President alone of officers confirmed by the Senate was cited as an exception to the general rule. The statement of the court was only as to what the then practice in regard to removals of such officers was, and the then existing legislative construction, without any intimation that such construction was the true construction of the Constitution.

And the Supreme Court has never decided the question. On the contrary, in the case of Embrey vs. The United States, heretofore cited, the court, while it construed and gave effect to the tenure-of-office act of 1869, distinctly announced that it did not pass upon the question of the constitutionality of the act.

In the case of Blake vs. United States, 13 Otto, page 227, the proviso of the fifth section of the Army appropriation act of July 7, 1866, before referred to, was construed. The court said:

> Two constructions may be placed upon the clause of that section without doing violence to the words used. Giving them a literal interpretation, it might be construed to mean that although the tenure of Army and naval officers is not fixed by the Constitution, they shall not in time of peace be dismissed from the service under any circumstances or for any cause or by any authority whatever, except in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect, or in commutation thereof. Or, in view of the connection in which the clause appears, following as it does one in the same section repealing provisions touching dismissals of officers by the President alone, and to assignments by him to command of troops without regard to seniority of officers, it may be held to mean that whereas under the act of July 17, 1862, as well as before its passage, the President alone was authorized to dismiss an Army or naval officer from the service for any cause which, in his judgment, either rendered such officer unsuitable for, or whose dismissal would promote the public service, he alone shall not thereafter in time of peace exercise such power of dismissal except in pursuance of a court-martial sentence to that effect or in commutation thereof. Although this question is not free from doubt, we are of opinion that the latter is the true construction of the act.

This decision has been claimed to be a decision sustaining the power of Congress to prevent the President from removing officers of the Army and Navy, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except for cause, to be established by the judgment of a court-martial. It does not go to that extent, as it was not necessary to do so. The court held only that a removal made by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, which was Blake's case, was not prohibited by the act in question, expressing doubt as to the power of Congress by legislation to impair the power of the President and Senate acting together to remove an officer, but expressing no doubt and raising no question as to the power of Congress to restrict the power of removal by the President alone, as was done by the act.

It has been contended that the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act may be placed upon the power of Congress to regulate the exercise by the President of executive powers, and by fixing the official tenure of public officers to control the executive power of removal. If, as is claimed by the advocates of the power of the President to remove Federal officers without the consent of the Senate, such power is conferred upon him by the Constitution, and the removal of such officers is the exercise of purely executive functions, it would be beyond the power of Congress to abridge it. But the author of the tenure-of-office act and the distinguished statesmen who advocated its passage in Congress, as well as the opponents of the measure, all understood and so declared that the act was wholly incompatible with the existence of such an absolute power in the President. President Johnson in his veto message cited the so-called legislative construction of the Constitution by the First Congress, and Mr. Madison's remarks in the House of Representatives upon the debate upon the bill to establish a department of foreign affairs, the decision of the Supreme Court in Ex parte Hennen, Mr. Justice Story's and Mr. Chancellor Kent's Commentaries upon the Constitution, and placed his veto squarely upon the proposition that the power of removal of officers to whom the act applied was vested in the President alone by the Constitution, and that the act was, therefore, an unconstitutional interference with the powers of the President.

Hon. George H. Williams, then Senator from Oregon, and who was the author of the bill, in advocating its merits in a speech in the Senate on January 14, 1867, said—

I ask the Secretary to read what I have marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

I referred to the case of Ex parte Hennen, where the power of removal was held to be an incident of the power of appointment. All respectable authorities sustain that position. Now, is that law or not? Will some of these honorable Senators, who contend for the existence of this power in the President, tell me whether that opinion of the Supreme Court, deliberately pronounced, is or is not the law of the land? I assume that it is the law, because it has been sustained by other authorities and is not denied; and if it be the law, then I say that this bill stands upon an immovable foundation, because the power of appointment is undeniably vested in the President and Senate of the United States. One can not appoint without the other. Now, is it good logic to argue that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment—the power to appoint is in the President and Senate, and therefore the President has the right to remove? Is it not just as good logic to argue that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment—the President and the Senate appoint, and therefore the Senate may remove? But, sir, the correct logic is, that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment; the President and the Senate appoint; therefore the President and the Senate may remove. There is no constitutional prohibition, there is no statutory regulation upon this subject, to prevent the application of that doctrine; and I say that unless gentlemen can overthrow the opinion of Alexander Hamilton, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Ex parte Hennen, they can not escape from the conclusion that the consent of the Senate is necessary to the removal of an officer to whose appointment it was necessary to have the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. And Senator SHERMAN, during the debate upon the bill, said:

But this is the position of affairs: the Congress of the United States now intend to assert the power of the Senate to prevent removals from office. We have seen within the last year the spectacle of the whole revenue service upturned. Why? To reward partisans to betray a party. That was the purpose; everybody knows it. Last fall certain executive officers entered the shambles and removed by wholesale persons appointed to collect revenue, the most unpolitical office in the world, for the purpose of controlling the election of members of Congress, thus deranging our financial system. The evil of this course became so palpable that men of all parties desired some change. When we came to examine the Constitution of the United States we found that the framers of the Government contemplated a control over the power of removal; that the true construction of the Constitution required that the Senate shall take part in the removal of an officer as well as in his appointment, and we now by law assert the principle that the President of the United States shall not, without the assent of the Senate, remove an officer appointed with the consent of the Senate, except in certain cases. The correctness of that principle the Senator himself concedes, for he says that if he looked to the Constitution alone he would say that was right, but he thinks a different construction has prevailed. The whole history of that construction has been debated in the Senate, and we now propose to go back to the true interpretation of the Constitution and say that the power of removal ought not to exist in any man unless it is restrained by the power of the Senate. That is the true constitutional rule.

There can be no doubt that the tenure-of-office act of March 2, 1867, and the amendatory act of 1869 were and were intended to be a legislative constructions of the Constitution upon the question of the power of removal from office, and emphatic declarations by Congress that the consent of the Senate is necessary for the removal from office of any officer confirmed by it.

As we have seen, Mr. Madison, to whose ability and personal influence the construction put upon the Constitution as to the power of removal by the House of Representatives at the First Congress was largely due, believed that removals could only be properly made and would only be made for cause, and from the formation of the Government until Jackson came to the Presidency it was the accepted theory and the constant practice that removals were not to be made for political reasons. Under Jefferson and the second Adams there was great pressure for removals, but the first six Presidents made only seventy-three removals in the forty years covered by their terms. Washington made nine, all for cause; John Adams nine, none for political reasons; Jefferson thirty-nine, which he claimed were made for sufficient cause; Madison five; Monroe nine; John Quincy Adams two; Jackson, from March 4, 1829, to March 4, 1830, seven hundred and thirty-four. President Cleveland during the recess of the Senate, a period of about eight months, made six hundred and forty-three suspensions, and up to the 9th of February, 1886, the whole number of nominations made by him since March 4, 1885, was one thousand seven hundred and seventy-two; the number exclusive of Army, Navy, and Revenue Marine Service, one thousand six hundred and eighty-two. Of the vacancies the number caused by death was twenty-four, by resignation four hundred and seventy, by expiration of term four hundred and two.

The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary appear to have been under a misapprehension as to the extent to which the suspension of civil officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate had been carried. They say in their report:

Nearly twelve months have elapsed since the President's inauguration, and six hundred and fifty will more than cover the whole number of removals or suspensions. Had the number reached as many thousands as hundreds he would not have by this time made an equal division between the two national parties of the offices not embraced in the civil-service law.

I have no means of determining the exact number of Federal officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, who, I suppose, may be considered an authority upon the subject, in an article upon "Removals from office," which appears in the Cyclopedia of Political Science, Political Economy, and United States History, a work published in 1882, and which article in all probability was written during that year, states that the number of the non-elective officers of the United States nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate is about thirty-five hundred. Although not so stated, it is possible that civil officers are meant. The increase in the number of such officers, including postmasters at offices which have become Presidential since that date, will certainly not increase the number beyond four thousand. Out of these four thousand offices up to the 9th of February last sixteen hundred and thirty-two had been filled by the present administration by appointment or by designation under the act of 1867.

The following statement, showing the whole number of some of the principal civil officers appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the number of changes up to February 9 last, and the number of resignations and suspensions, will show the rapidity with which the leaven of civil-service reform has worked since March 4, 1885:

Out of 85 internal-revenue collectors, there had been at that date (March 9) 79 appointments and designations of persons to fill the places of suspended officers, there having been 11 resignations and 61 suspensions.

Out of 2,248 postmasters whose appointments are Presidential, there have been 955 appointments and designations, 267 resignations, and 78 suspensions.

Out of 107 registers of land offices there have been 44 appointments and designations, there having been 11 resignations and 24 suspensions.

Out of 107 receivers of public moneys at land offices 53 changes have been made, there having been 17 resignations and 20 suspensions.

Out of 120 collectors of customs there have been 65 appointments and designations, there having been 7 resignations and 45 suspensions.

Out of 60 surveyors of customs there have been 19 appointments and designations, there having been 4 resignations and 12 suspensions.

Out of 96 United States attorneys there have been 46 changes—11 resignations and 28 suspensions.

Out of 61 Indian agents 35 have been changed, there having been 16 resignations and 13 suspensions.

Out of 18 pension agents there have been 12 appointments and designations, there having been 3 resignations and 6 suspensions.

Out of 241 consuls there have been 81 appointments and designations, 7 resignations and 57 suspensions.

Out of 64 United States marshals there have been 43 appointments and designations, 11 resignations and 24 suspensions.

It should not be supposed that the very large number of resignations which have taken place since March 4, 1885, have been entirely voluntary. In many cases, indeed I think in most cases, they have been made upon requests from the Departments and because officials preferred to resign rather than to be removed.

It will be seen that suspensions from office of officers appointed by and with the advice of the Senate have been very general. Not only is this true of internal-revenue collectors, appraisers of merchandise, ministers, and consuls who do not hold for fixed terms, but it is also true of officers whose terms are fixed by law.

I may not comprehend what civil-service reform is, but whatever it means I understand both political parties to be committed to it, and I have supposed that as it was contained in the political platforms and in letters of acceptance of Presidential candidates, it forbade removals from office of competent officials for political reasons.

The Democratic platform in 1872 contained the following:

We therefore regard a thorough reform of the civil service as one of the most pressing necessities of the hour; that the honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claim to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage, and public station become again a post of honor.

And the Democratic platform of 1876 contained the following:

Experience that proves efficient, economical conduct of governmental business is not possible if the civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot-box, be a brief reward of party zeal, instead of posts of honor assigned for proved competency, and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men, nor the instrument of their ambition.

The Democratic platform of 1880 declared for thorough reform of the civil service, and that of 1884 for honest civil-service reform.

The Republican platform of 1872 declared that—

Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life tenure of office.

The platforms of 1876 and 1880 contained as emphatic declarations in favor of civil-service reform.

The platform of 1884 contained the following:

The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reformed legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.

Mr. Blaine in his letter of acceptance, in speaking of civil-service reform, said:

Impartiality in the mode of appointment to be based on qualification, and security of tenure to be based on faithful discharge of duty, are the two ends to be accomplished.

Mr. Cleveland in his letter of acceptance said:

The selection and retention of subordinates in Government employment should depend upon their ascertained fitness and the value of their work, and they should be neither expected nor allowed to do unquestionable party service.

In his inaugural address he said:

The people demand reform in the administration of the Government and the application of business principles to public affairs. As a means to this end civil-service reform should be in good faith enforced. Our citizens have the right to protection from the incompetency of public employés who hold their places solely as the reward of partisan service and from the corrupting influence of those who promise, and the vicious methods of those who expect such rewards. And those who worthily seek public employment have the right to insist that merit and competency shall be recognized instead of party subserviency, or the surrender of honest political belief.

And in his first message to Congress he said:

The allurements of an immense number of offices and places exhibited to the voters of the land, and the promise of their bestowal in recognition of partisan activity, debauch the suffrage and rob political action of its thoughtful and deliberative character. The evil would increase with the multiplication of offices consequent upon our extension; and the mania for office-holding growing from its indulgence would prevert our population so generally that patriotic purpose, the support of principle, the desire for the public good, and solicitation for the nation's welfare would be nearly banished from the activity of our party contests, and cause them to degenerate into ignoble, selfish, and disgraceful struggles for the possession of office and public place.

In an editorial in the Civil Service Record for December, which publication I assume may be justly considered as an exponent of the principles of civil-service reform, under the caption of the President's message, the question of the repeal of the four-years' term law is referred to in connection with the President's recommendations upon the subject of civil service as follows:

We regret that the President did not see fit to recommend the repeal of the four-years-term law. That law is now the most obvious obstacle to the further progress of reform principles, and its repeal is the piece of work in national legislation to which reformers are especially directing their efforts. It ought to go at once. We should have been glad if the President had added the weight of his recommendation to the demand for its repeal. It may be that his party can not yet be induced to accept this further application of reform principles. They may wish to wait until there has been more of an "equalization" of the offices between the Democrats and the Republicans, before abolishing this convenient machinery for getting rid of Republicans and substituting Democrats. Yet the Democrats have now a strong interest in repealing the law. They need to do it, in order to stand well with the reformers and independents, without whose votes they can not hope to remain in power. And they also need to do it, because it will most effectually protect their own Democratic appointees in the event of their defeat at the polls.

At the annual meeting of the Boston Civil Service Reform Association, held on the evening of December 10, 1885, Hon. Carl Schurz, who is, or claims to be, an expounder of the principles of civil-service reform, addressed the meeting, and in the course of his remarks said:

It is an outrage upon the right of the people to good government, when a victorious party wantonly disorganizes the administrative machinery to reward its members with a monopoly of official emolument at the expense of the public interest. It is, therefore, a gross violation of the true democratic principle when the non-political administrative service is made a partisan service. What, in this respect, true democracy means may be learned from the first and greatest apostles of the democratic faith in American history.

American Democrats who desire to enforce especial respect for their creed are apt to call themselves Jeffersonian Democrats. They ought, therefore, above all things, to hold Jefferson's principles and teachings in high esteem. What were those principles and teachings with regard to the matter in question? When Jefferson became President, the offices under the Government had long been in the hands of the Federalists, just as when Cleveland became President the offices had long been in the hands of the Republicans. The pressure for a general change, "a clean sweep," was very strong and urgent in both cases. What did Jefferson do? Turn all the Federalists out to fill the places with his own partisans? By no means. He made a few removals for cause, and filled those places and a few more otherwise vacated with members of his party. Why did he put members of his party in? In order to make the service a partisan service? By no means. The Federal offices had been almost exclusively in the hands of Federalists. Jefferson put some Republicans in, so that the service should, in future, be less a partisan service than it had been before. Each party was to have a share of it. He put some Republicans in, and left a good many Federalists in by way of a distinct and emphatic protest against the vicious doctrine that the public service should be filled with members of one political party alone. He proclaimed his doctrine in this respect in words which have become famous. "This done," he said—that is, the principle being practically vindicated that the public service should not belong to one party alone, but to all in common—"this done, I shall return with joy to that state of things where the only question concerning a candidate shall be, 'Is he honest? is he capable? is he faithful to the Constitution?' and not, 'Does he belong to the ruling party?'"

I know full well that those who would accomplish a great reform must have patience. They must have that patience which appreciates slow progress and will not be discouraged by temporary reverses; that patience which will not at once insist upon all or nothing, but will advance carefully, step by step, from one result to another. But the necessity of patience does not justify that timidity which shrinks back at every appearance of contradiction. It is such timidity which tells us to-day that this is no time for agitating the repeal of the four years' term law, because public sentiment is not yet prepared for it. What the state of public sentiment in that respect may be I don't know. But I do know that we should never have had the civil-service law and the competitive system for subordinate appointments had the matter not been agitated and urged before public sentiment seemed to be prepared for it. As soon as the law was in operation public sentiment turned out to be much better prepared for it than had been supposed. If public sentiment is not prepared yet for the repeal of the iniquitous four years' term law, then it is high time to prepare it. It is time to bring home to the popular understanding the manifold evils which that law has already wrought and is bringing forth. It is time to explode the false pretenses upon which it was erected, and upon which it is still defended as necessary to republican government. It is especially time to expose the gross ignorance or the arrant hypocrisy—at any rate, the glaring inconsistency—of these supporters of it who, calling themselves Jeffersonian Democrats, trample under foot Jefferson's principles, and uphold the spoils system, the rule of privilege and favoritism, in the name of Democracy.

The editor of the Record and Mr. Schurz appear to have been laboring under a very grave misapprehension as to the position taken by the President and his political advisers upon the question of the power of removal. I believe I should do them both an injustice if I did not attribute to them, in advocating the repeal of the four years' term law, the motive of desiring to prevent the removal of all those officers now holding for a fixed term at the expiration of their terms by operation of law, and to give an additional security and permanence to the tenure of office. The object aimed at by those civil-service reformers appears to be to make the tenure of civil officers a tenure during good behavior, and to limit removals from office to removals for cause.

They certainly do not advocate the doctrine now contended for by the President and by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, that all officers except the judges of the courts (whose tenure of office is fixed by the Constitution) are removable at the pleasure of the President without restriction and without the assignment of cause, and they could not have known that out of seventeen hundred and seventy-two changes in office made by President Cleveland during the first eleven months of his term there were six hundred and forty-three suspensions and four hundred and seventy resignations, many of which were made in pursuance of requests from the several Departments, which, under the circumstances, partook more of the character of demands.

When it was proposed in Congress in 1835 to repeal the act of 1820, fixing the tenure of certain officers, it was also proposed to couple with the repeal of the act a provision requiring the President when he removed any officer to lay the cause of the removal at the time of nominating his successor before the Senate, and thus practically restrict removals to removals for cause. I think Mr. Schurz, when he made the remarks quoted, must have supposed that the force of public opinion which had been to some extent crystallized in the platforms of the great political parties, and had found expression in the letters of acceptance of the candidates of those parties for the Presidency at the last and at preceding elections, and in the inaugural address and annual message of the present Chief Executive, would be sufficient to prevent the indiscriminate removal of officers whose terms were not fixed by law, and could not have known that neither such officers nor those holding for fixed terms under the position now taken by the leading members of the dominant party in this body, and adopted as the policy of the administration, hold by any tenure except the arbitrary will and unchecked caprice of the Chief Magistrate.

Under any other supposition it would be difficult to explain the statement in the editorial quoted that the Democrats have now the strongest interest in repealing the law, and that "they also need to do it because it will most effectually protect their own Democratic appointees in the event of their defeat at the polls," for it could not have been supposed that a Democratic President at discretion could remove from office all officers holding for fixed terms as well as those whose terms were not fixed by law, and that a Republican President, should one be elected in 1888, could not remove the appointees of his predecessor because they in effect would hold during good behavior, unless civil service is for the Republican party only and political promises are binding only upon it.

The junior Senator from Iowa in his recent speech upon the pending resolutions read a portion of a circular issued the 19th ultimo by the National Civil Service Reform League. I will incorporate it entire in my remarks, adding that every resolution meets my approval. It is as follows:

NATIONAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
New York, February 19, 1886.

The following resolutions were adopted at a meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League, held in New York city on Tuesday, February 15, 1886:

"Whereas publicity in all matters connected with appointments to and removals from office would serve to discourage the use of public offices for mere partisan purposes, and therefore greatly advance the reform of the public service: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the National Civil Service Reform League recommend—

"First. The abandonment by the Senate of the United States and by the several State senates of the practice of discussing and determining upon the confirmation or rejection of nominations for office in secret session.

"Second. The enactment of laws making it the duty of public officers intrusted with the power of appointment and removal to put upon public record in every case of removal the reasons therefor, or in the absence of such legislation the introduction, observance, and enforcement by the competent authorities of the practice of regularly recording the reasons for the removals made.

"Third. The practical recognition of the principle that recommendations for office as well as the representation of reasons for the removal of officers, addressed to the appointing and removing power, are acts affecting the public interest which should not escape responsibility, and that therefore such recommendations or representations should be regarded and treated not as private and confidential communications but as a part of the public record."

At the same meeting the following resolutions were also adopted:

"Resolved, That the members of this league have seen with pleasure the propositions made in the United States Senate, that members of the Senate and House of Representatives be prohibited by law from taking part in solicitations for public office, and desire most earnestly the passage of such a law at this session of Congress.

"Resolved, That the Civil Service Reform League protests against any change of existing civil-service laws, giving such preferences to any class of citizens as shall substantially impair the competitive merit system."

Attest: WILLIAM POTTS, Secretary.

I presume no one will claim that all these officers who were suspended during the recess of the Senate were inefficient officers, men of bad character, or were guilty of any breach of the law under which they held their offices, and many of them could not be justly charged with offensive partisanship. They were suspended under a claim of the absolute power of removal in the Chief Executive and for reasons satisfactory to him, but which he declines to give to the Senate although they were formally made and reported to the Senate under the provisions of the tenure-of-office act.

The President has in most instances nominated the persons designated by him to perform the duties of the office to fill the places of such suspended officers. By this he has said in effect, "Gentlemen of the Senate, during the recess of your body I have suspended six hundred and forty-three Federal officers, and I now propose to remove them from office and I ask you to advise and consent to their removal and the appointment of persons whom I have nominated to fill their places."

I, for one, when asked to advise the President to remove these officers, desire to know why they should be removed.

The law provides, as we have seen, that removals shall not be made except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The law contemplates, I think, that the cause for which it is proposed to remove an officer shall be laid before the Senate, and that if the cause is deemed sufficient by the Senate and only in that case the officer shall be removed.

If the Senate has no information upon the subject it certainly can not act intelligently, and should not, in such a case, advise the President to remove an officer unless there are other and controlling reasons which render such a course expedient. The Senate under the Constitution and laws having the power to prevent the removal of officers whose successors must be appointed by and with its advice and consent, the practical question is, what is the duty of the Senate in the premises? It is conceded by all that the President should be allowed to choose those officers upon whom he must rely for advice and assistance in shaping the policy of his administration, and no Senate has ever or ever will refuse to confirm such nominations. The President should be permitted without embarrassment by the action of the Senate to appoint heads of Departments and their assistants, the heads of bureaus and foreign ministers, but the great body of public officers appointed by and with the advice of the Senate perform judicial and executive duties only, under laws enacted by Congress, and have nothing to do with the policy of an administration, their tenure of office should not depend upon caprice or discretion of any officer of the Government, and their appointment and removal should, so far as practicable, be regulated by law.

The majority of the Senate, if sincere in their political opinions, must believe, the parties suspended being as well qualified to discharge the duties of their respective offices as the persons who have been nominated to fill their places, that the public service will be better subserved by their retention in office than by their removal. How is the majority of the Senate to justify its course if, notwithstanding this, without question and without inquiry as to the causes for removal it indiscriminately confirms the nominations in these cases of suspension?

Is there so little to be gained by contending for the power of the Senate, for a correct construction of the Constitution, and will the public business suffer so much by a prolonged controversy that the Senate had better abandon its constitutional prerogatives and consent to the removals of all suspended officers without question?

If so, let us assume the responsibility, put our action upon that ground, and go before the country with that excuse. I admit that the action of the Senate in these suspended cases must of necessity, to a considerable extent, be determined by practical considerations. It is the undoubted duty of the Senate to refuse to surrender the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, but when that has been duly asserted the extent to which it shall be exercised, perhaps, should be to some extent determined by questions of expediency.

The terms of many of the suspended officers have expired since their suspension, others have left the country or have made other business arrangements. In these cases and others where the circumstances are similar and it does not appear, and there is not reasonable ground to apprehend that the suspensions have been made upon secret and false charges, but have been made solely for political reasons, it may be expedient to confirm the nominations, on account of the present condition of the public service—a condition for which the Senate is in no way responsible—and such action placed upon such grounds may be taken without a relinquishment by the Senate of its constitutional powers or an abandonment of the position upon this subject steadily adhered to by it for more than twenty years past.

The resolutions under consideration if adopted will leave the Senate at liberty to do this. By them it is only asserted that it is the duty of the Senate in cases where public documents on file in the executive department, an inspection of which is deemed by the Senate necessary to enable it to act intelligently upon a proposed removal from office when called for by it are withheld, to refuse to advise and consent to that removal.

Mr. President, what I have said upon this question has not been said by way of complaint of the President's course in the matter of removals. I do not undertake to construe his public declarations; I leave that for his political friends. Those who hold to the doctrine that the power of removal is absolutely vested in the President under the Constitution probably think that he has made too few suspensions.

It has been said during this debate that the Senate is engaged in a controversy with the President for the sake of keeping Republicans in office. I disclaim any such motive for what I have done, or what I shall do in this matter. I know the universal sentiment on this side of the Chamber is that the interests of the Republican party are not subserved by keeping Republicans in office. There is no desire or intention of raising an issue with the administration for that purpose. It has been said by members upon this side of the Chamber that they intended to treat the present administration precisely as they would have treated his predecessor under similar circumstances. I do not believe there is a Senator on this side who will not do that.

I am disposed to go further, and if the President shall say to the Senate in the case of any suspended officer that there are charges against him or facts concerning the conduct of his office which are furnished for the consideration of the Senate, and upon which his removal is proposed, I for one will consent to the removal if there appears to have been reasonable ground for the suspension, although the cause assigned does not, in my judgment, justify the removal. But when the President says to the Senate only, "I have, during the recess of the Senate, suspended A B, and now propose with your advice and consent to remove him and appoint C D to the place; the suspension was made in the exercise of my discretion; I decline to inform you whether there were any charges filed against A B, or any showing of facts made as to his fitness for the office or the manner in which he conducted it," the Senate must either say "We know of no reason why A B should be removed, and therefore withhold our consent," or it must abandon the intelligent exercise of its constitutional powers.

The propriety and justice of giving a man proposed to be removed from office upon charges of wrongdoing an opportunity to vindicate his good name, and the necessity of the Senate being informed of the nature of such charges for that purpose, was admirably stated by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in his speech yesterday, from which I quote:

A man may be grievously wronged by removal from an office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate upon charges of wrongdoing, which, though believed by the President, may have no foundation in fact. It is the right of the person so wronged to appeal to this Senate for vindication. Experience has shown that an Executive may be led to suspend upon ex parte statements, and that, too, without any very careful inquiry into their truth or falsity.

Can it be that such wrongs can be perpetrated in this country, and, contrary to the legal maxim, have no remedy? I think not. I contend that a duty devolves upon the Senate to see in so far as it can that such wrongs are not perpetrated. How can the Senate discharge that duty intelligently unless they can be made acquainted with the facts? How can Senators say that they consent to and approve the action of the Executive if they are denied all knowledge of the ground of such action? The duty was not imposed upon the Senate without the right by natural implication to get at the information necessary to intelligently discharge it. Where can the information be found? Only in the Executive Departments of the Government. This is now denied us by the Executive. Look, then, at the position of the President! A law stands upon the statute-books, and is one of the laws he has solemnly obligated himself to see faithfully executed. That law, by the only reasonable construction that can be put upon it, imposes a duty upon the Senate, in the discharge of which it is necessary for the Senate to have access to certain papers on file in the Executive Departments. These the President denies to the Senate. He stands, therefore, in the position of blocking by his own act the operation of a law he is bound to see faithfully executed.

Every consideration of justice to the men against whom charges of wrongdoing have been made, every consideration of respect for the law, to say nothing of consideration of courtesy due from one branch of a common government to another, should suggest a prompt compliance on the part of the President with the request of the Senate for papers from the public files upon which he has acted in suspending civil officers. Without such information may not the Senate of the United States make itself party to great wrongs to worthy and deserving citizens by blindly indorsing the action of the Executive, while the law plainly makes it its duty to investigate and act with deliberation?

Or, on the other hand, may not the Senate, for want of proper information in the premises, commit a wrong on the Government itself by refusing to consent to the removal of an officer, whose removal the good of the public service really demands?

It may be argued that the Senate should make its own investigation as to the fitness or unfitness of persons who are nominated to or suspended from office. Nothing could be more specious.

These men are suspended, it is to be presumed, upon specific charges made and filed against them. They do not know with what they are charged, or by whom. How can such charges be answered? How can the Senate find out whether the officer was properly suspended?

Suppose, for example, charges are made against a civil officer by a political opponent who wants the office himself, and is so eager to secure it that he will even resort to falsehood and perjury to secure the suspension. Would the Executive put a premium upon perjury by throwing around the statements of such a person the veil of secrecy to protect him from the consequences of his statements falsely made?

The majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, after reciting in their report the public declarations of the President contained in his annual message, say:

This highly important and valuable official communication in the presence of six hundred and forty-three suspensions from office would seem to lead to the conclusion that this number of the civil officers of the United States selected to be suspended and removed had been so derelict in the performance of their functions or guilty of such personal misconduct as to put them in the category of unfaithful public servants deserving dismissal by the President and the Senate and the condemnation of their countrymen. In such a state of things we think that the common sense of justice and fair play that is so much prized, as we believe, by the people of the United States would require that in some way this large body of men should have an opportunity to know the substance of their alleged misdoings in order that they may either admit their guilt or, denying it, explain their conduct, or show that the accusations against them were selfish and wicked pretexts, and set up for the mere purpose of obtaining their suspension and ultimate dismissal from office in order that others less capable and worthy might at once receive the honors and emoluments of their places. It is known to every Senator that, so far as the Senate has had to do both with removals and appointments, it has for a great number of years been its practice, when any officer or person was before it for removal or appointment against whom any serious accusation has been made which would, if true, influence the action of the Senate in the case, to cause the person concerned to be informed of the substance of the complaint against him and give him an opportunity to defend himself; and it is also known that at this very session a very considerable number of instances of that kind have occurred and are daily occurring. If the Senate is proceeding upon a false principle in such instances, it is high time that its course in these respects should be reversed, and that hereafter it should act upon such accusations without any knowledge other than that derived from the accusers, and leave the victims of such injustice to console themselves with the reflection that all parties are now engaged in an effort to reform the Government.

Why should the facts, as they may appear from the papers on file, be suppressed? Is it because that, being brought to light, it would appear that malice and misrepresentation and perjury are somewhat abundant, or merely that faithful and competent and honorable officers have been suspended and are proposed to be removed, under the advice and consent of the Senate, in order that places may be found for party men because they are party men or are the special objects of party favor?

How does it happen in this time of suggested reform and purer methods in government that for the first time it is thought important that the historic and administrative facts relating to the official and personal conduct of officers of the United States should be withheld and that the administration of the Government should proceed with a secrecy and mystery as great as in the days of the Star Chamber?

The President in his message of the 1st instant says:

Though the propriety of suspensions might be better assured if the action of the President was subject to review by the Senate, yet if the Constitution and the laws have placed this responsibility upon the executive branch of the Government, it should not be divided nor the discretion which it involves relinquished.

I entirely agree with this proposition, and so do we all, but when the President asks that a suspended officer shall be removed, the responsibility for the removal is placed by the Constitution and laws upon the President and the Senate, and the power and discretion of the Senate should not be relinquished.

The President says:

I am not responsible to the Senate, and I am unwilling to submit my actions and official conduct to them for judgment.

The Senate has not claimed that the President is responsible to it, nor has it claimed the right to have the actions or official conduct of the President submitted to it for judgment. It has only asked that when the President requests its official action, namely, its advice and consent to the removal of a public officer, the proper Department shall transmit for information copies of official documents on file in the Department upon which the removal of such officer is proposed and which it is supposed will furnish information to the Senate to enable it to act intelligently. The President is not responsible to the Senate, but every officer of this Government under our Constitution and laws, from the President to the constable and from the Chief-Justice to the justice of the peace, is amenable to the Constitution and the laws.

The President, in his message, says:

I regard the papers and documents withheld and addressed to me or intended for my use and action, purely unofficial and private, not infrequently confidential, and having reference to the performance of a duty exclusively mine. I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department, but as deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control.

The assumption is most extraordinary that papers and documents addressed to the President or heads of Departments intended to induce official action and upon which official action has been based, such as the suspension of a public officer, and upon which it is proposed that a public officer shall be removed from office, and upon which the Senate is asked to advise and consent to the removal, and which have been treated as public and filed in the Departments, should be claimed to be "still completely under the control of the President and of the heads of Departments."

It appears to me that in the face of the legislative constructions of the Constitution of 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1869, which have been acquiesced in until the present time, in face of the tenure-of-office act, now in full force, the Senate can not justly say that the responsibility for the wholesale removal of Federal officers, which would take place if the President's nominations in case of suspensions are confirmed indiscriminately, rests with the President alone. I, for one, am not willing to say so. If the tenure-of-office act is unconstitutional, the courts have power to declare it so, but Congress alone has power to repeal it. I do not consider the right of the Senate under the Constitution and the laws to give or withhold its advice and consent to the appointment and removal of public officers as a matter which can be waived. It is not a personal matter. The power vested in the Senate is a public trust to be faithfully executed for the public welfare. It is the duty of the Senate to freely accord to the Chief Magistrate the unobstructed exercise of all the power the Constitution has conferred upon him. But it is equally the duty of the Senate to insist upon the exercise of whatever power is conferred upon it by the Constitution and the laws.

The question of protecting officers who have been suspended from the consequences of false and secret charges made to secure their removal is worthy of consideration. The question of how a certain course will affect the transaction of the business of the Senate and the public service should not be ignored, but the great and controlling question is, what is the right course? When that is determined, so far as I am concerned, I am desirous of seeing it pursued with dignity and firmness, and am willing to trust the country to vindicate the wisdom of so doing.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, a discussion of the issue between the Senate and the President would be very incomplete without some reference to the constitutional power of the President over the subject of removals from office. An affirmation in the most solemn form of the existence of the power in the President to remove officers without the advice and consent of the Senate was made in 1789, in the First Congress, after a debate the most noted for exhaustiveness and ability in the history of the Government. No man has been able since to say anything new or original on the question, the great minds engaged in that discussion having left nothing more to be said. If it had not already been done so copiously in the report of the minority of the Judiciary Committee and in the speeches of those who have preceded me in this debate, I would quote from the great arguments of 1798 in defense of the power of the President as then settled; but this having been done so fully I shall content myself on this point with a brief statement of my views without elaboration.

In order to a consideration of the proposition that the tenure-of-office law is repugnant to the Constitution and ought to be treated as a nullity, I invite attention to the partition of the powers of the Government among three great departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial, in the following provisions of the Constitution:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. (Article I, section 1.)

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. (Article II, section 1.)

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. (Article III, section 1.)

Thus are divided all the powers possessed by this Government between three great independent and co-ordinate departments, which check and balance each other. The independence of these departments each of the other is a distinguishing feature of the Government established by the Constitution. One department makes laws, another expounds them, and the third executes them. A union of all three of these powers in the same hands, or of any two of them, would fill the definition of a despotism, hence their distinctness and independence from and of each other has been severely guarded in the Constitution.

The only mixing or commingling of powers in the Constitution is when the Executive may check the legislative power with the veto and require two-thirds of each House to overcome it, and when a check is placed upon the power of the Executive in making treaties and appointing officers by requiring the advice and consent of the Senate, and when the Senate under the Presidency of the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court sits as a court of impeachment and performs judicial functions. Subject to these exceptions, there is no commingling of powers except in the appointment of certain inferior officers, which may be vested elsewhere by Congress than in the President, but each great department is separate from, independent of, and co-ordinate with the other; that is to say, all executive power is in the President, all legislative power is in the Congress, and all judicial power is in the courts.

The underlying question in the contest now pending between the President and the Senate is whether the power to remove officers is vested by the Constitution solely in the President, or in the President subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

I here read the clauses of the Constitution bearing upon this question:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. (Constitution, Article II, section 1, clause 1.)

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States. (Idem, Article II, section 3, at end.)

He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law, but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. (Idem, Article II, section 2, clause 2.)

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session. (Idem, Article II, section 2, clause 3.)

Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, [those conferred upon Congress] and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. (Idem, Article I, section 8, clause 18.)

That the power to remove officers as well as to appoint them is an executive power, nobody questions or doubts. That it is absolutely necessary that the power to remove shall reside somewhere, and shall be exercised so that incompetent, inefficient, dishonest, and corrupt officials shall be displaced and good and efficient men put in office, is equally unquestionable. No government can be administered without the exercise of this power. Yet the Constitution nowhere mentions it; indeed, is absolutely silent on the subject. It can not be assumed that the great masters of the science of government who framed the Constitution overlooked or omitted this absolutely necessary power. They provided for filling the offices, vesting in the President the power to appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

This mingling of the executive with the power of one of the branches of the legislative department of the Government is a notable exception to the well-guarded separation and distinctness preserved with but one other exception, to wit, the treaty-making power between the executive and legislative departments. By all the rules of construction this exception must be strictly construed, must be restricted to the plain and reasonable meaning of its terms, and must not be extended to embrace more than those terms imply. The President's power to appoint is subject to the "advice and consent of the Senate," because the Constitution so provides, but the Constitution does not provide for the advice and consent of the Senate to removals from office. Without this provision in the Constitution nobody would doubt the power of the President at will to appoint and to remove all officers (except judges), because the power of appointment and of removal of officers is purely an executive power, and all executive power is expressly by the Constitution vested in the President.

The advice and consent of the Senate to the exercise of the power of appointment by the President is a check upon, a restriction and qualification of, the general executive power vested in the President. It can readily be seen that this was deemed necessary, because it would be impossible for the President from his personal knowledge to select officers throughout the broad expanse of this country for the execution of the laws, and the Senate, composed of men of high character coming from every State in the Union, could properly be presumed to possess the knowledge necessarily wanting in the President in this regard. It may, too, have been thought that a check upon the power of appointment was necessary to curb the power of an ambitious man in the office of President. But no such check has been placed in the Constitution upon the power of removal, confessedly in the absence of any qualifying provision, embraced in the grant of all executive power to the President. It would seem that the familiar maxim, "Expressio unius exclusio alterius est," is eminently applicable here. When we look for the reason of the failure of the Constitution to qualify the power of removal vested in the President in the general grant of all executive power, as it qualifies the President's power of appointment, we find it strong, clear, and abundant.

The President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." How can he correct mistakes in making appointments without the power of removal? How can he exercise supervision and control over his official agents appointed for the enforcement of the laws without the power of removal of dishonest, incompetent, and inefficient officers? How can he carry out the policies which have received the indorsement and approval of the people in his election without agents in harmony with his purposes, and how can he have these without the power of removal? Ought the President to be held responsible, as he is by the express terms of the Constitution, for the faithful execution of the laws unless invested with the power to remove faithless official agents?

Is the Senate responsible for the enforcement of the laws? Not at all; that responsibility is placed on the President, and on him alone. Can he execute the injunction of the Constitution, that he shall "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," with a hostile Senate sustaining the official instrumentalities furnished him by the Constitution to carry out its injunction, in opposition to him, and to his purposes and policies? Most clearly he can not. With the power of removal vested in the President he can justly be held responsible for a faithful execution of the laws, while if in the President and Senate nobody is responsible, because when the responsibility is divided out between the Senators and President, as has been truly said, the share of each is so small as to amount to no responsibility at all, and responsibility is the only security for good government. A knowledge of the faithlessness or inefficiency of officers, requiring their removal, is peculiarly within the province of the President, whose duty it is to supervise and superintend them in the discharge of their respective functions, and outside of the province or cognizance of the Senate. Every consideration of reason sustains that construction of the Constitution suggested by its terms and the necessary implications from them.

I will read here some passages from the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall in the noted case of Marbury vs. Madison, reported in 1 Cranch, which throws much light on this subject, and which by common consent, from the day of its delivery to this hour, expresses the proper view of the questions discussed. In that case Chief-Justice Marshall said:

These are the clauses of the Constitution and laws of the United States which affect this part of the case. They seem to contemplate three distinct operations: (1) The nomination. This is the sole act of the President, and is completely voluntary. (2) The appointment. This is also the act of the President, and is also a voluntary act, though it can only be performed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. (3) The commission. * * * This is an appointment made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and is evidenced by no act but the commission itself. In such a case, therefore, the commission and the appointment seem inseparable; it being almost impossible to show an appointment otherwise than by proving the existence of a commission. Still, the commission is not necessarily the appointment, though conclusive evidence of it. * * * The appointment being the sole act of the President, must be completely evidenced when it is shown that he has done everything to be performed by him.

* * * * * * *

The last act to be done by the President is the signing of the commission. He has then acted on the advice and consent of the Senate to his own nomination. The time for deliberation has then passed. He has decided. His judgment on the advice and consent of the Senate concurring with his nomination has been made, and the officer is appointed. This appointment is evidenced by an open, unequivocal act. * * * That point of time must be when the constitutional power of appointment has been exercised: And this power has been exercised, when the last act required from the person possessing the power has been performed. This last act is the signing of the commission. * * * The transmission of the commission is a practice directed by convenience, but not by law. It can not, therefore, be necessary to constitute the appointment which must precede it, and which is the mere act of the President. * * * The appointment is the sole act of the President; the acceptance is the sole act of the officer, and is, in plain common sense, posterior to the appointment.

The President nominates; the Senate consents to the nomination or refuses assent to it. If the latter, the President may nominate the same person again and again, as often as he is rejected, as was repeatedly done by General Jackson. The President alone can suggest a person for appointment. The sole power and office of the Senate is to consent or refuse its assent to the appointment of the person named by the President. If the Senate consents to a nomination, or, in common parlance, confirms it, it still rests in the discretion of the President to appoint the person thus confirmed or not. He may refuse to appoint notwithstanding the consent of the Senate, and nominate another and different person for the place. It will be noted that this power, this discretion of the President, to appoint or not, as he chooses, remains in him after the Senate has exhausted all its power over the subject and has nothing further to do with it, because it has confirmed the nomination, and that is the end of the power of the Senate over it.

The other act to be performed is purely executive, and is the voluntary act of the President, to be performed or not as he determines, and that is the issuance of the commission, the only evidence of the appointment. If, after the Senate has confirmed the nomination and has exhausted its power over the subject, the President discovers that he has made a mistake in nominating the man, or for any other reason deems it his duty not to commission him, he has the admitted right to refuse to do so. Having this right before the issuance of the commission, how can that purely voluntary executive act, with which the Senate has nothing to do, deprive the President of the power possessed before it was performed, of correcting his mistake in making the nomination without consultation with or the consent of the Senate?

I confess, Mr. President, that I am unable to perceive, when the whole matter rests in the discretion of the President after the Senate has exhausted all its power over the subject, how a purely voluntary executive act such as the issuance of a commission can have the effect of reviving the exhausted jurisdiction of the Senate and reattaching it to the subject, so as to compel the President to ask the Senate's consent to a removal. I can imagine no reason why the discretion to appoint or not as he may determine which remains after the Senate has acted, in the President, does not survive to him in the power of removal after the commission is issued. To hold that it does so survive is simply to continue in the President the power confessedly in him up to the time when he issues the commission, and is as necessary for the public good after as before that act.

I here send to the Clerk's desk to be read a paper embodied in quotation marks in a speech of Senator Sprague, of Rhode Island, made in the debate of 1869 on the tenure-of-office law. The Senator did not give the name of the author, but common report at that time, I am reliably informed, attributed the authorship to Chief-Justice Chase. The argument is so comprehensive and exhaustive, and at the same time is so terse, clear, and unanswerable, that it leaves nothing more to be said on the subject:

One of the three following propositions is true:

Either the power of removal is one of legislative jurisdiction; that is to say, deriving its authority from act of Congress and subject to regulation thereby;

Or it is a power vested in the President and Senate jointly, only to be exercised by their concurrent act;

Or it is purely a Presidential prerogative.

1. Is it a subject of legislative jurisdiction? Article 1, section 1, of the Constitution provides as follows: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The Congress, therefore, can exercise no other powers than such as are "granted" as above. The powers granted are such as are expressly defined in terms in the Constitution and such derivative powers as may be necessary to carry them into execution, and they constitute the entire body of the legislative powers of the Government of the United States.

If we look now to the Constitution it will be seen that the only grants of legislative power made thereby are to be found in the ten sections constituting article 1; in three paragraphs in section 1; in one paragraph in section 2, and one paragraph of section 3, article 2; in one paragraph in section 1, two paragraphs in section 3, article 4; and one paragraph of article 5; and if we scrutinize all these provisions it will be seen that not only is there no express grant of power over the subject of removal, but that no such power is rightfully to be derived by implication from any of them as being necessary to carry into effect the express grants of power contained therein.

In this view, having thus surveyed the whole field of legislative powers, we find that, so far as the power of removal is concerned, it is not there, either in express terms or by legitimate implication; and not being there, the inevitable conclusion is that it is not of the domain of legislation, capable either of being created or controlled by act of Congress.

2. Is it a power vested in the President and Senate jointly, only to be exercised by their concurrent act?

The argument relied upon to sustain this proposition is that the power of removal is an incident of the power of appointment, and that whereas the joint action of the President and the Senate can alone give validity to appointment, the power of removal is subject to the same condition of concurrent action on the part of the President and of the Senate. That this position is untenable will readily be seen. The provision of the Constitution whence arises the only authority which the Senate exercises in this regard is contained in the second section of article 2 of the Constitution and is in these words: "And he [the President] shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers," &c.

The President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint." This is the precise language, and beyond the authority thus granted the Senate has no other in the appointment of officers. What is this authority? In common parlance it is called the act of confirmation by the Senate; but it is not that as a constitutional fact. It is the power to advise and consent after a nomination shall have been made—nothing more. The power of appointment is an independent power vested only in the President. The President nominates, and, the Senate advising and consenting thereto, the President may or may not appoint, as in his executive right and pleasure he sees fit. The function of the Senate in this matter is simply one of assent or dissent, not controlling even the question of appointment; and when it shall have exercised this function in the manner of assent or dissent its constitutional power is exhausted.

In the authority thus given to the Senate of "advice and consent," not only is there no authority vested in that body, either in express terms or by implication, over the subject of the removal of an officer, but not even over the subject of his appointment. The President may nominate; the Senate may exercise its prerogative of advice and consent, and still the President may not appoint. To assume to derive from the terms of this auxiliary intermediate power, thus vested in the Senate, jurisdiction of the subject of removal of an officer is to give thereto an implied signification broader in the scope of its authority as to removal than that which they contain in express terms as to appointment—a conclusion utterly at conflict with the true canons of constitutional construction.

3. Is it or not purely a Presidential prerogative?

Not being found either as a legislative power or as a power vested in the President and Senate jointly, it must be found in the executive branch of the Government, for it could be lodged nowhere else save in the judicial branch, and no one contends for that. But is it not clear from other provisions of the Constitution that it is vested exclusively in the President?

In the first place, that it is an executive function is not to be denied, in all governments as well as in our own; and by section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution it is provided that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

It is derivable also from the provision of the Constitution (section 3 of article 2) which provides that the President "shall take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed." That the power of removal is essential to the faithful execution of the laws can not be gainsaid. And by the established rule of construction that the express grants of the Constitution carry with them by implication all such powers as are necessary for their execution, herein is found a source of authority for the exercise of this power by the President as undeniable as the fact that for the past eighty years it has been universally recognized.

This argument amounts to absolute demonstration, and has never been answered and can not be.

The experience of the country under the operation of the tenure-of-office law of 1867, which led to its practical repeal by the amendment of 1869, demonstrating as it did that it is impossible for a body organized as the Senate is to participate with the President in the exercise of the power of removal without fatally obstructing the proper exercise of the functions both of the legislative and executive departments, and bringing the executive, a great co-ordinate department of the Government, into contempt and disparagement, while aggrandizing out of all proportion the powers of the Senate, which is the farthest removed from the people of all the branches of the Government and the least responsible, converting it into an executive directory, and making of it what Mr. Jefferson says all "executive directories become, mere sinks of corruption and faction," is a powerful, indeed an unanswerable, argument in favor of that construction of the Constitution, so consonant with its theory, so logically consistent with its terms, and so convenient of execution, which vests the power of removal exclusively in the President. For it must be admitted that the framers of the Constitution did not mean to confer a power upon the Senate from the execution of which the evil results so graphically depicted by President Grant, Senators Morton and SHERMAN, and Mr. Blaine, the great leaders of the Republican party, as having ensued legitimately and necessarily from it. I invite attention to the unanswerable arguments of these great party leaders against the claim of the Senate to power over removals, based upon actual experience of its exercise under the act of 1867.

I read from the first message of President Grant to Congress on this subject:

It may be well to mention here the embarrassment possible to arise from leaving on the statute-books the so-called "tenure-of-office acts" and to earnestly recommend their total repeal. It could not have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, when providing that appointments made by the President should receive the consent of the Senate, that the latter should have the power to retain in office persons placed there by Federal appointment against the will of the President. The law is inconsistent with a faithful and efficient administration of the Government. What faith can an Executive put in officials forced upon him, and those, too, whom he has suspended for reason? How will such officials be likely to serve an administration which they know does not trust them?

I read now the testimony of Mr. SHERMAN, then and now a Senator from Ohio, given in the debate of 1869:

Has the Senator from Vermont arrived at that exemplary and forgiving state of mind that he would not be willing to remove any man who disagreed with him in opinion, or, in other words, who was a Democrat, unless he could be convicted of crime upon satisfactory evidence?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Permit me to ask the Senator whether I ought not to have arrived at that virtuous point on true principles of government, whether I have or not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think so. I believe that all the leading officers of this Government ought to be in harmony with the political sentiments of the majority, and that although the doctrine of Governor Marcy was rather too bluntly stated in his expression that "to the victors belong the spoils," yet in actual practice, in theory, and in fact no administration of this Government ever did or ever will exist without practically acting upon the rule that to the successful party belong the great offices of the Government. It may not be according to the theoretical codes of morality and public policy which the Federalists talked of when the Democrats were in power, and which the Democrats talked of when the Federalists were in power, but still it is a rule of practical administration which will always be applied in a republican form of government.

Now, in my judgment, the tenure-of-office law can not, with due regard to the public interests, be practically enforced. What has been our experience within two years? When we came back here we were met with piles of documents which the President sent to us; various papers showing that certain officers of the Government had performed acts which in his judgment amounted to misdemeanor, &c., and for which they were suspended. He gave us specific facts and evidence. These cases were referred to the appropriate committees. What were we called upon to examine? We had to take up and carefully read piles of papers and examine each particular case, like a chancellor or a judge of assize. Every suspended officer contended that he was the most innocent man born since the time of Adam. He demanded a trial, and copies of charges and proof and a formal hearing before the committees of this body, he converting us into a court and jury to try his particular case. If we could not try him, why demand charges and evidence?

If the tenure-of office act was right in principle we were bound to examine each case to see whether or not the accused officer was, according to the language of the law, guilty of misconduct in office or crime, or had become incapable or legally disqualified. "The result was that some of the committees of this body could not transact their business. These cases were referred, and after great delay were reported upon. In one case the accused was tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary while we were deliberating whether he was properly suspended or not." The result was that we did not and could not determine them.

There probably will be from five hundred to five thousand removals during the next year in the service of the United States in the ordinary course of the business of this country. The number of officers to whose appointment the confirmation of this body is required I should estimate in round numbers at from five to twenty thousand. We know there are great multitudes of them whose appointments require the confirmation of the Senate. If we have to remain here, and act upon the cases of all removals, in order to evade the second section, we put ourselves to a great deal of unnecessary trouble merely to evade one of our own laws. If we adjourn, and leave the President without any power to remove, and only the power of suspension, his hands are effectually tied. He can not suspend a postmaster, or a revenue officer, or any of this vast multitude of officers, unless he is prepared upon satisfactory evidence to make out a case of crime or misconduct in office.

It is practically impossible thus to administer the Government. The practical effect of the tenure-of-office act is to keep bad men in office, to divide the responsibility for their misconduct, to enable the President to shield himself from responsibility, and to destroy the energy, efficiency, and unity absolutely necessary in the executive administration of various departments of the Government. That was the practical effect.

Now, Mr. President, look at the actual result as we know it existed. It was the common practice for applicants for office to run here to members of the Senate and say: "I can get an appointment if I am sure of confirmation." There was not a member of the Senate who was not pressed constantly by his constituents to pass his judgment in advance on the question of confirmation and before his appointment—"I can get the appointment if I am sure of confirmation," which reversed the whole order of proceeding in filling the offices of the Government. The Senate became the appointing power; that was the course of business. The result was that many men who had an acute sense of honor who wished to be free from all this kind of double complication, would not seek or accept office under an administration so hampered and controlled.

The duty of the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments. The Constitution confers on this body no power to remove. We consent to removals; we advise as to confirmations. When a man is removed from office, and another name is sent here, we pass simply upon his qualification and fitness for the office; but the Constitution confers upon us no power to proceed in the removal. That is conferred only by the tenure-of-office act. Nowhere else do we derive such a power. By the tenure-of-office act the power of removal, as well as the power of confirmation, is conferred on the Senate; and I say with such a power invested in the Senate it will be impossible to avoid controversy and collision between the executive power and the Senate. We shall share in and finally monopolize the power of the Executive over all the offices of the Government.

Senators must very easily draw distinction between the power of removal and the power of confirmation. The power of confirmation is a resulting power, depending on the previous act of another officer of the Government; and all we say in our act of confirmation is whether or not the person named is a man fit to discharge the duties of the office. That power can not and will not be abused; but the power of removal is a very different power, a power never contemplated to be invested in the Senate.

It seems to me that we are now acting as judges in our own case. If this great power of the Senate is maintained to prevent the removal of any officer of this Government, it is maintained by the Senate for its own behalf. The public judgment will say that, although we are nominally interested, we are maintaining powers that were never conferred upon the Senate until two years ago, and which were then conferred for a special purpose. In my opinion we ought to be careful that our judgment should be impartial, and not to be influenced by a love of power.

* * * * * * *

We share in one-half of the legislative authority of this Government. We are judges over all officers in the trial of impeachment. We participate with the Executive in the power of appointing to office, also in the power to make treaties. I ask if all these great powers are not sufficient for the ambition of any Senate.

* * * * * * *

As a general rule, it is not wise to mingle the powers of the various departments of the Government. There are three great divisions or departments of the Government that stand apart from each other. They form the triangle of public safety, and upon them rest the safety, order, and good conduct of society. These are the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments. They have been in exceptional cases mingled. The Senate shares with the President in the appointing power, and also shares with the President in the treaty-making power, &c. It is not wise, in my judgment, to overlook this division of powers.

I now read from the debate of 1869 some of the utterances of Senator Morton, of Indiana, on the same subject.

What is the effect when the Senate becomes a tribunal for the trial of the causes for which men are suspended? Scarcely any officer can be found of any importance who will not have some Senator upon this floor as his friend, and that Senator will stand up and inquire, "What are the causes for which this man has been suspended? I have known him; he is my friend; perhaps I secured him the appointment, and I can not consent to his removal unless there is some tangible and sufficient cause made out." Then the Senate must enter upon the investigation. They must examine into the causes of this man's suspension. Is he an honest officer? If not, what has he done? If he is an incapable officer, wherein has he failed? These are questions we must pass upon.

Each one of these suspensions is a case. If we concur in the suspension after examination, the officer goes out of this Chamber with a blemish upon his character which he can scarcely outlive. If we refuse to concur in the suspension, we say to the world the President has done this man injustice, either intentionally or unintentionally. If he acted in good faith, he acted in ignorance; if he was well informed, then he acted in bad faith, or out of malicious feelings toward this man.

The President is in some respects on trial also; and as he is to be put on trial as to whether his judgment has been intelligent or has been an honest one in regard to the man suspended, he must feel a great deal of interest in the result; and if he is to be adjudged in this way he will hesitate a long time before he makes the suspension. He may be satisfied in his own mind that an officer is not doing right, but unless he can procure facts that are tangible in themselves, and that can be laid definitely before the Senate, or can be stated intelligently before a jury, he will not suspend that man, and the maladministration goes on. Will you tell me, sir, that any administration can be conducted efficiently under the operation of that law?

Now, Mr. President, let me suppose that this law remains in force, what will be the effect of it? When we come back here in the month of December we shall find a long docket of these cases of suspensions, perhaps several hundred of them, and they will have to be tried one by one. We take up the first case. That perhaps takes one afternoon, or one entire executive session; it may be two or three; and I tell you, sir, that this Senate will not have time, if it devotes its whole time to the consideration of these cases, to pass upon them if the President shall suspend every officer that in his judgment ought to be suspended for dishonesty or inefficiency. It will impose upon the Senate a labor that it can not perform. It will be physically impossible for it to discharge that labor.

There must be responsibility somewhere. The very essence of successful administration under every constitutional government is that the responsibility shall be distinctly located somewhere. Suppose he suspends an officer, and the Senate does not concur in that suspension; that part of the responsibility then belongs to the Senate. It is divided between some sixty or seventy gentlemen on this floor, and the share of each gentleman is very small. If the responsibility is placed between the President and the Senate, neither of them will have the whole of it. We divide it up until it amounts to nothing.

I read again from the work recently published by Hon. James G. Blaine. Speaking of the tenure-of-office act of 1867, he says:

The bill was not passed, however, without considerable misgiving on the part of many members of both Houses who voted for it. It was an extreme proposition—a new departure from the long-established usage of the Federal Government, and for that reason, if for no other, personally degrading to the incumbent of the Presidential office. It could only have grown out of abnormal excitement created by the dissensions between the two great departments of the Government. The bitterness engendered resembled that which always distinguishes a family quarrel. The measure was resorted to as one of self-defense against the alleged aggressions and the unrestrained power of the executive department. But the history of its operation and of its subsequent modification, which practically amounted to its repeal, is one to which the Republican party can not recur with any sense of pride or satisfaction. As matter of fact, a Republican Congress, largely composed of the same members who had enacted the law, indirectly confessed two years later that it could not be maintained. Regarded only in the light of expediency at the time, it could readily be demonstrated (as was afterward admitted by candid men among those who supported it) to be a blunder—a blunder all the more censurable because the act was not needed to uphold the reconstruction policy of Congress, in aid of which it was devised.

Who, Mr. President, can doubt the dangerous and obstructive influence upon the Government and the corrupting influence upon the Senate to flow from an exercise of the power sought to be wrested from the Executive and appropriated by the Senate by the resolutions now before this body? And who, sir, can doubt after reading what these distinguished party leaders have said, is the result of an effort by the Senate to exercise the power claimed, the utter impossibility and impracticability of its exercise by this body?

When to these considerations is added the legislative construction of the Constitution, given on this subject by the first Congress assembled under it in 1789 before adverted to, composed in large part of the framers of the Constitution, in the enactment of laws for the establishment of the Department of Foreign Affairs (now of State) and of the War Department, and of the Treasury Department, in which the power of removal was expressly held, after a debate led by Mr. Madison, regarded as the greatest in the history of Congress, to be a constitutional prerogative of the Executive and vested solely and exclusively in the President, and that this construction advocated with matchless power by Mr. Madison, who has been called the Father of the Constitution, and approved by George Washington, the Father of his Country, who as President signed the bills containing it, stood unbroken and unchallenged for seventy-eight years, approved over and over again in repeated and most solemn decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and by every commentator who has written on the Constitution from Kent and Story to Bancroft, sustained by every President from Washington to Andrew Johnson, by every Attorney-General of the United States, and by every statesman and public man of any political party who figured in or out of Congress during the same period, it would seem that the argument has been exhausted, and that the precedent established ought to be immovable, and beyond the reach of innovation.

But, Mr. President, nothing is impossible or sacred with blind, unreasoning partisanship. In 1835, for the first and only time in their great careers, Clay, Calhoun, and Webster, moved by a common hatred for Andrew Jackson, forgot their own differences, and for the purpose of curbing his power made a combined assault upon the great precedent established by Washington and Madison, at that time for more than a half a century treated as a final and irrevocable settlement of the question, and this, although each one of them had repeatedly in official and public utterances approved it. The precedent remained unmoved and unharmed by their attack, mighty as was their combined power, while they never recovered from the crushing defeat. In 1867, under circumstances on which I will not dwell, because they are fresh in the memory of the country, an overwhelming Republican majority in the two Houses of Congress confessedly, as the debates on the tenure-of-office law of 1867 and 1869 abundantly and conclusively show, passed the law of 1867 for the sole purpose of obstructing Andrew Johnson's administration in disposing of the offices of the Government and of securing to the Republican Senate a controlling power over them.

It was for this purpose, when the country had just emerged from a long and bloody civil war and was in a condition bordering closely on revolution, when passion and excitement ran high and reason and judgment were unsettled, that the law of 1867, overthrowing the construction of the Constitution which had been established and observed for eighty years, was enacted, an act regarded as a blunder and spoken of publicly with expressions of regret since, by the broadest minded, ablest, and most honored leaders of the Republican party—an act which the same Republican majority that passed it made haste, in 1869, upon the recommendation of President Grant, to practically repeal by the law of that date.

Never before was a great principle, deeply imbedded in the Constitution and judgment and history of the country, disturbed under conditions so exceptional, and never before was one virtually and practically restored under circumstances implying a higher tribute to its correctness, its wisdom, and its justice. A brief experience of two years only was needed to vindicate the wisdom and sagacity of the great patriots who in 1789 established and fixed it, and to extort from those who had rudely shaken it an acknowledgment of their great error.

I read sections 1 and 2 of the tenure-of-office act of 1867, which were repealed in 1869:

Be it enacted, &c., That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized, at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

I now read sections 1 and 2 of the act of 1869, which were substituted for repealed sections of the act of 1867; also section 3 of the act of 1869, being an amendment of the section of the same number of the act of 1867:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first and second sections of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and in lieu of said repealed sections the following are hereby enacted:

That every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he shall have been appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That during any recess of the Senate the President is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the United States courts, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed in his discretion by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time; and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall, during the time he performs his duties, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of such office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended; and it shall be the duty of the President within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, to nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section 3 of the act to which this is an amendment be amended by inserting after the word "resignation," in line 3 of said section, the following: "or expiration of term of office."

I now read from the debates upon the act of 1869, as they occurred just before its passage, showing the construction and exposition of this act by those who enacted it:

Senator Morton said:

The first section repeals the first and second sections of the present law, and those are the objectionable sections. The next section authorizes the President during the recess of the Senate to suspend any officer whose appointment has been made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to appoint another person to take his place, who shall be duly qualified according to law, and the person thus appointed to take the place is to hold until the end of the next session of the Senate, unless before that time some person is appointed by the President and is confirmed by the Senate.

The main difference between this amendment and the old law is that it relieves the President entirely from the necessity of sending his reasons to the Senate for a suspension; it provides that the suspension may be made in his discretion; and in the next place it relieves the Senate from any duty to consider the suspensions. The present law requires the Senate to pass upon all suspensions, either to concur or non-concur. The amendment relieves the Senate from any duty in passing upon suspensions, but the Senate may pass on the suspension in its discretion, and if, upon a vote, it shall refuse to concur in any suspension, the effect of that is that at the end of that session the former incumbent will take his place again, will go back to his office. Then, of course, the President may instantly suspend him again; so that, in point of substance, it is within the power of the President to say that the law amounts to nothing.

But if the Senate takes no action at all upon the suspension, and if no person is confirmed for the office during that session, at the end of the session the office is declared to be vacant, and the President may fill it in the ordinary way under the Constitution. I believe I state the effect of the proposition correctly, that if the Senate shall take affirmative action and refuse to concur in the suspension then the person who has been temporarily appointed will hold to the end of that session, but at the end of that session the old incumbent will go back into his office unless the President shall instantly suspend him again. If the Senate take no action on the suspension one way or the other—of course they are not required to act—and fail to confirm anybody in the mean time, then at the end of the session the office is declared to be vacant, and the President may fill it in the ordinary way.

This amendment relieves the law of all its practical difficulties; that is to say, it does not require the President to give reasons; he may suspend for any reason or for no reason at all. It relieves the Senate from the duty of considering suspensions, which I have before argued was a duty that was incapable of being performed. But it does reserve to the Senate the power of vetoing a removal by the President. That is the substance of the power reserved, that the Senate, by affirmative action non-concurring in a suspension, may thus veto a removal by the President, and at the end of the session the officer temporarily appointed goes out and the incumbent comes back; but this veto practically will amount to nothing, because the President may instantly suspend him again, and so it goes on. It preserves the shadow rather than the substance. It is an imperfect shadow of a substance that has already fled; a bad photograph of a dead body. But, sir, while I shall not oppose it and make no argument against it, I will simply say that personally I can not vote for it, because by reserving the veto power of the Senate, the power to veto a removal in the way I have described, it does violate the theory I hold on this subject.

Mr. LOGAN, then a member of the House of Representatives, said:

I do not desire more than a few minutes of time. I have been one of those in favor of the repeal of this law, and whether satisfied or not with the report of the committee of conference I shall vote for it, and desire to give my reasons for so doing.

The objection to the amendment from the Senate the other day was this: they provided in that amendment that the President should have the right to suspend from office; but if the person nominated or designated in his place should not be confirmed by the Senate, then if the Senate affirmatively refused to concur in the suspensions, the suspended officer should again become clothed with official robes. My objection was this: if they should concur in the nomination, then if the Senate should stop right there and take no further action, the office would become vacant; but if the Senate at a future time should vote affirmatively against the suspension, then it revived the office in the party suspended. That was my objection to it; and for this reason: in the provision of the Constitution which allows the President to nominate and the Senate to consent, requiring the assent of both when an officer was suspended, the office became vacant; then if at a subsequent time the Senate could by an affirmative action put an officer back in office, I say that was putting executive power in the hands of the Senate without the consent of the President. Hence I maintained that it was unconstitutional. I believe it was. That was my proposition and that was my statement.

Now, sir, the conference committee, whether because that point was made or not makes no difference to me, have stricken from the bill that which was obnoxious. It relieves the bill of that portion which clearly to my mind was unconstitutional. What have they left? They have left the shadow of the substance and nothing more. Although I should prefer a bill of two lines: "Be it enacted, &c., That the civil tenure-of-office law, approved at such a date, is hereby repealed," although I would have preferred that, yet, inasmuch as the Senate have some pride of opinion, and the House have some pride of opinion, and the Republican portion of the House are divided in reference to this question, and the Senate and House had chosen a committee of members representing both sides of that question, I am willing to vote for the report which they have made. In their agreement they have done, in my judgment, what I would have done, except they have employed different language from that which I would have employed. I would have said "repealed," but they have said in a great many words what amounts to the same thing.

Mr. Bingham in the House said:

Now, what the Senate has done—and this is the point that I desire to make before this House and before the country—is substantially a repeal of the tenure-of-office act in so far as it fetters executive action. It is because the Senate has done this that I desire the House to concur, acting in this matter upon the principle of statesmen, to do what we can do in the right direction though we may not be able to do all that we would. The obligation is upon us, and I appeal to the conscience of gentlemen, if we intend to give the President an opportunity to discharge his trust free from the fetters imposed upon him by the tenure-of-office act, to concur in the Senate amendment, which does substantially repeal that act in so far as it fetters the Executive.

* * * * * * *

If not by concurring in this amendment we shall have attained what certainly is of very great consequence. We shall have repealed the first section and the second section of the tenure-of-office act. We shall have given the President power to suspend every civil officer without assigning any reasons for so doing and without being challenged by anybody.

These utterances of leading representative men of the Republican party are simply specimens of those which characterized the entire debate, showing the animus which inspired the passage of the act of 1867 and the controlling motives for its virtual repeal in 1869. Throughout the debate the undercurrent of opinion, breaking out frequently and repeatedly into the strongest and most emphatic expression, was that the law of 1867 was a blunder to be receded from, and that the amendment then adopted and now on the statute-book was a practical repeal of it. Especially was the expression emphatic and unqualified without a dissenting voice that the law of 1869 restored to the President in effect the same power as to removals that he possessed prior to the passage of the act of 1867.

It is under the act of 1869, thus expounded by the ablest men and greatest leaders of the Republican party, negativing every point they make, that the Senator from Vermont and the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary find their authority for the extraordinary demand made upon the President, and for the still more extraordinary resolutions pending before the Senate. The demand upon the executive department is made in the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

Why in executive session, in connection with the consideration of the suspension of the district attorney of the southern district of Alabama and the appointment of his successor, is a demand made for copies of all documents and papers filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of said district attorney? Under the law as it now stands, null and void though it is claimed to be for unconstitutionality, if admitted to be valid and constitutional, it is confessed on all hands that the President is free and unfettered and can suspend officers in vacation of the Senate, within his discretion, without accountability to anybody.

That portion of the act of 1867 which required his reasons and evidence for making suspensions reported to the Senate was expressly repealed by the act of 1869, and since that time there has been no power under this Government authorized to revise or question his conduct or motives in making suspensions. The commissions issued by the President during the recess of the Senate, both under the law of 1869 and Article II of the Constitution, which authorizes the President to "fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session," are beyond the reach of the Senate, and the action of the President in making suspensions is equally so. Having no jurisdiction over the subject and no power to do anything with it, the demand for the President's reasons for his action is an impertinent intermeddling by the Senate with a matter with which it has nothing to do, and has been properly treated by the President as such.

The right of the Senate to copies of all papers on file relating to the fitness of Burnett, who was nominated to fill the place of the officer proposed to be removed, is admitted, because the appointment can only be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and its fitness to be made is a proper subject-matter of inquiry by the Senate. All such papers have been promptly furnished in this and in all other cases. The answer of Attorney-General Garland to the Senate resolution, the material portion of which I now read, shows this:

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett, recently nominated to said office, having been already sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution, and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

In demanding more than has been freely and promptly furnished by the President, the Senate has required all that could have been demanded of him under the law of 1867, which was repealed, as I have shown, for the express purpose of relieving the President from such accountability.

I here read from the message of the President sent to the Senate on the 1st day of March, and ask that it be remembered that the utterance is an official one from the sole representative of a great department of the Government, the equal of and co-ordinate with the other departments. He says:

Ever since the beginning of the present session of the Senate, the different heads of the Departments attached to the executive branch of the Government have been plied with various requests and demands from committees of the Senate, from members of such committees, and at last from the Senate itself, requiring the transmission of reasons for the suspension of certain officials during the recess of that body, or for the papers touching the conduct of such officials, or for all papers and documents relating to such suspensions, or for all documents and papers filed in such Departments in relation to the management and conduct of the offices held by such suspended officials.

The different terms from time to time adopted in making these requests and demands, the order in which they succeeded each other, and the fact that when made by the Senate the resolution for that purpose was passed in executive session, have led to a presumption, the correctness of which will, I suppose, be candidly admitted, that from first to last the information thus sought and the papers thus demanded were desired for use by the Senate and its committees in considering the propriety of the suspensions referred to.

Though these suspensions are my executive acts, based upon considerations addressed to me alone, and for which I am wholly responsible, I have had no invitation from the Senate to state the position which I have felt constrained to assume in relation to the same, or to interpret for myself my acts and motives in the premises.

In this condition of affairs I have forborne addressing the Senate upon the subject, lest I might be accused of thrusting myself unbidden upon the attention of that body.

But the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, lately presented and published, which censures the Attorney-General of the United States for his refusal to transmit certain papers relating to a suspension from office, and which also, if I correctly interpret it, evinces a misapprehension of the position of the Executive upon the question of such suspensions, will, I hope, justify this communication.

* * * * * * *

Upon this resolution and the answer thereto the issue is thus stated by the Committee on the Judiciary at the outset of the report:

"The important question, then, is whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves."

I do not suppose that "the public offices of the United States" are regulated or controlled in their relations to either House of Congress by the fact that they were "created by laws enacted by themselves." It must be that these instrumentalities were created for the benefit of the people and to answer the general purposes of government under the Constitution and the laws, and that they are unencumbered by any lien in favor of either branch of Congress growing out of their construction, and unembarrassed by any obligation to the Senate as the price of their creation.

The complaint of the committee that access to official papers in the public offices is denied the Senate is met by the statement that at no time has it been the disposition or the intention of the President or any Department of the executive branch of the Government to withhold from the Senate official documents or papers filed in any of the public offices. While it is by no means conceded that the Senate has the right in any case to review the act of the Executive in removing or suspending a public officer upon official documents or otherwise, it is considered that documents and papers of that nature should, because they are official, be freely transmitted to the Senate upon its demand, trusting the use of the same for proper and legitimate purposes to the good faith of that body. And though no such paper or document has been specifically demanded in any of the numerous requests and demands made upon the Departments, yet as often as they were found in the public offices they have been furnished in answer to such applications.

The letter of the Attorney-General in response to the resolution of the Senate in the particular case mentioned in the committee's report was written at my suggestion and by my direction. There had been no official papers or documents filed in his Department relating to the case within the period specified in the resolution. The letter was intended, by its description of the papers and documents remaining in the custody of the Department, to convey the idea that they were not official; and it was assumed that the resolution called for information, papers, and documents of the same character as were required by the requests and demands which preceded it.

Everything that had been written or done on behalf of the Senate from the beginning pointed to all letters and papers of a private and unofficial nature as the objects of search, if they were to be found in the Departments, and provided they had been presented to the Executive with a view to their consideration upon the question of suspension from office.

Against the transmission of such papers and documents I have interposed my advice and direction. This has not been done, as is suggested in the committee's report, upon the assumption on my part that the Attorney-General or any other head of a Department "is the servant of the President, and is to give or withhold copies of documents in his office according to the will of the Executive and not otherwise," but because I regard the papers and documents withheld and addressed to me or intended for my use and action, purely unofficial and private, not infrequently confidential, and having reference to the performance of a duty exclusively mine. I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department, but as deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control. I suppose if I desired to take them into my custody I might do so with entire propriety, and if I saw fit to destroy them no one could complain.

Even the committee in its report appears to concede that there may be with the President, or in the Departments, papers and documents which, on account of their unofficial character, are not subject to the inspection of the Congress. A reference in the report to instances where the House of Representatives ought not to succeed in a call for the production of papers is immediately followed by this statement:

"The committee feels authorized to state, after a somewhat careful research, that within the foregoing limits there is scarcely in the history of this Government, until now, any instance of a refusal by a head of a Department, or even of the President himself, to communicate official facts and information as distinguished from private and unofficial papers, motions, views, reasons, and opinions, to either House of Congress when unconditionally demanded."

To which of the classes thus recognized do the papers and documents belong that are now the objects of the Senate's quest?

They consist of letters and representations addressed to the Executive or intended for his inspection; they are voluntarily written and presented by private citizens who are not in the least instigated thereto by any official invitation or at all subject to official control. While some of them are entitled to executive consideration, many of them are so irrelevant, or in the light of other facts so worthless, that they have not been given the least weight in determining the question to which they are supposed to relate.

Are all these, simply because they are preserved, to be considered official documents and subject to the inspection of the Senate? If not, who is to determine which belong to this class? Are the motives and purposes of the Senate, as they are day by day developed, such as would be satisfied with my selection? Am I to submit to theirs at the risk of being charged with making a suspension from office upon evidence which was not even considered?

Are these papers to be regarded official because they have not only been presented but preserved in the public offices?

Their nature and character remain the same whether they are kept in the Executive Mansion or deposited in the Departments. There is no mysterious power of transmutation in departmental custody, nor is there magic in the undefined and sacred solemnity of Department files. If the presence of these papers in the public offices is a stumbling-block in the way of the performance of Senatorial duty, it can be easily removed.

The papers and documents which have been described derive no official character from any constitutional, statutory, or other requirement making them necessary to the performance of the official duty of the Executive.

It will not be denied, I suppose, that the President may suspend a public officer in the entire absence of any papers or documents to aid his official judgment and discretion. And I am quite prepared to avow that the cases are not few in which suspensions from office have depended more upon oral representations made to me by citizens of known good repute, and by members of the House of Representatives and Senators of the United States, than upon any letters and documents presented for my examination. I have not felt justified in suspecting the veracity, integrity, and patriotism of Senators or ignoring their representations because they were not in party affiliation with the majority of their associates; and I recall a few suspensions which bear the approval of individual members identified politically with the majority in the Senate.

While, therefore, I am constrained to deny the right of the Senate to the papers and documents described, so far as the right to the same is based upon the claim that they are in any view of the subject official, I am also led unequivocally to dispute the right of the Senate, by the aid of any documents whatever, or in any way save through the judicial process of trial on impeachment, to review or reverse the acts of the Executive in the suspension during the recess of the Senate of Federal officials.

I believe the power to remove or suspend such officials is vested in the President alone by the Constitution, which in express terms provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The Senate belongs to the legislative branch of the Government. When the Constitution by express provision superadded to its legislative duties the right to advise and consent to appointment to office and to sit as a court of impeachment it conferred upon that body all the control and regulation of executive action supposed to be necessary for the safety of the people; and this express and special grant of such extraordinary powers, not in any way related to or growing out of general Senatorial duty, and in itself a departure from the general plan of our Government, should be held under a familiar maxim of construction to exclude every other right of interference with executive functions.

The requests and demands which by the score have for nearly three months been presented to the different Departments of the Government, whatever may be their form, have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my exclusive discretion and executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people from whom I have so lately received the sacred trust of office. My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistracy which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance with these demands.

To the end that the service may be improved, the Senate is invited to the fullest scrutiny of the persons submitted to them for public office, in recognition of the constitutional power of that body to advise and consent to their appointment. I shall continue, as I have thus far done, to furnish, at the request of the confirming body, all the information I possess touching the fitness of the nominees placed before them for their action, both when they are proposed to fill vacancies and to take the place of suspended officials. Upon a refusal to confirm I shall not assume the right to ask the reasons for the action of the Senate nor question its determination. I can not think that anything more is required to secure worthy incumbents in public office than a careful and independent discharge of our respective duties within their well-defined limits.

It has been claimed that the present Executive having pledged himself not to remove officials except for cause, the fact of their suspension implies such misconduct on the part of a suspended official as injures his character and reputation, and therefore the Senate should review the case for his vindication.

I have said that certain officials should not, in my opinion, be removed during the continuance of the term for which they were appointed solely for the purpose of putting in their place those in political affiliation with the appointing power; and this declaration was immediately followed by a description of official partisanship which ought not to entitle those in whom it was exhibited to consideration. It is not apparent how an adherence to the course thus announced carries with it the consequences described. If in any degree the suggestion is worthy of consideration, it is to be hoped that there may be a defense against unjust suspension in the justice of the Executive.

Every pledge which I have made by which I have placed a limitation upon my exercise of executive power has been faithfully redeemed. Of course the pretense is not put forth that no mistakes have been committed; but not a suspension has been made except it appeared to my satisfaction that the public welfare would be improved thereby. Many applications for suspension have been denied and the adherence to the rule laid down to govern my action as to such suspensions has caused much irritation and impatience on the part of those who have insisted upon more changes in the offices.

The pledges I have made were made to the people, and to them I am responsible for the manner in which they have been redeemed. I am not responsible to the Senate, and I am unwilling to submit my actions and official conduct to them for judgment.

In this communication the President has given a concise, clear, and at the same time comprehensive and perfectly just statement of the whole question of difference between the executive department of the Government and the Senate. Honesty, courage, manliness, devotion to duty, and an inflexible determination to maintain intact the prerogatives of the great office confided to his keeping by the people, breathe through every line and sentence of this remarkable and forceful state paper. The feeble attempt, by indirection and verbal jugglery for small political and partisan purposes, to evade the law and coerce from the President under another name his reasons for the suspension of an officer by demanding "copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama" is in this message stripped to nakedness of all disguise and forced in its uncovered deformity to stand comparison before the public gaze with the open, honest, straightforward methods of a statesman in the fearless and conscientious discharge of high public duty.

It is a paper which should be read by every voter in all this country, to whatever party he may belong, for the mass of voters of all parties are honest and interested in politics only that good government may result, and no honest, patriotic citizen can read and understand the report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee and the answer of the President thereto without feeling that the President is intrinsically right, and, in view of his conservatism, his firm resistance to the just demands of his party friends in the matter of removals from office, which I by no means approve, that the assault upon him is utterly wanton and unprovoked, without a shadow of excuse or justification, made for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the people in the hope of securing a party advantage without reference to the public good.

The public press of the country and the speeches of Republican Senators on this floor proclaim and avow what is matter of common and public notoriety, that the object and purpose of this extraordinary proceeding by Republican Senators, while admitting that they have no right to demand the President's reasons for suspending officers, is by indirection and through a mere pretext to extort these reasons from him, hoping to make a little political capital by distorting them, and to justify themselves in obstructing the President in carrying on the Government; and last and greatest of all, to enable them to hold on to the offices of the Government notwithstanding the popular verdict which placed a Democratic majority of forty in the House of Representatives and a Democratic President in the White House at the last election, and through them demands a change of men, as well as of measures, wherever in the judgment of the President a change may be necessary.

The Senator from Vermont commenced his argument in support of the pending resolutions by saying that he rose to speak in behalf of a "calm and orderly and constitutional exercise of the functions of Government." I shall not question the sincerity of the honorable Senator, but claim to be myself sincere in believing that this whole proceeding is intended to embarrass the administration of the Government and defeat the will of the people as expressed in the last election.

It seems that the majority of the Senate is forgetful of the fact that the President of the United States is the great executive head of the Government, and that as such he has power and prerogatives as clearly defined and as fully guarded in the Constitution as are those of the other Departments. They seem to forget that the President, when he responds to the demand of the Senate and furnishes promptly all the public and official papers asked for and says courteously to the Senate that the other papers not furnished are not official papers but his own private papers, some of them confidential communications, is backed by 55,000,000 of people who indorse him as truthful, honest, wise, just, patriotic, loyal, and consequently as one who ought to be believed when he makes an official statement under the sanction of his official oath.

The President has made that statement in solemn form in his message to the Senate; and coming as it does from one great department of the Government to a part of another co-ordinate department, it should, by all the rules which govern or should govern these departments of Government in their intercourse with each other, be held to import absolute verity. Upon no other theory can harmony be preserved and frequent and exasperating collisions between the great departments of the Government be averted. A due regard for the "calm and orderly" administration of the Government should have prompted the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee to have withdrawn the pending resolutions upon the incoming of that message. The monstrous proposition that the President can have no private or personal or confidential papers, documents, or letters in the Departments is asserted in the report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee. I interpose, as a conclusive answer to this, the solemn statement of the President to the Senate that he has such papers and documents in all the Departments—his own private papers handed over by him to the several members of his Cabinet—for safe custody. The President, it does seem, ought to be believed when he says that these papers are of no interest to the public.

He has them in his possession, and ought to know. But, Mr. President, I will not discuss a proposition which denies to the President of the United States a right possessed by the humblest citizen in this country of protecting his private and personal correspondence, for he has told the Senate that he is ready to furnish copies of all public papers and documents in any of the Departments, and that these which he will not furnish are his own papers, in which the public has no interest.

Think for a moment, Mr. President, of the condition in which the President would be placed under the operation of the rule laid down by the Senator from Vermont. The President has vested in him all the executive power of the Government; that power which enforces the laws and appoints and removes officers. Who would write to the President recommending the removal of a dishonest officer? Who would write him of suspicions that an officer was faithless? Who would write him warning him against a bad man seeking an appointment? Who would advise him of anything going wrong if all these letters were to be open to the public and liable at any time upon the suggestion of partisan malice to be published to the world? The President would be isolated; his sources of information would be cut off, and his efficiency as an executive officer greatly impaired. In all our courts certain confidential communications are protected on grounds of public policy, and where is a higher public policy than that which protects the President in withholding his private and personal papers from the public gaze when through that means the entire executive department of a great government receives increased vigor and efficiency.

In refusing courteously but firmly to deliver upon demand of the Senate papers referring to the suspension of officers, a matter resting solely within the discretion of the President, with which the Senate has no concern and over which it has no jurisdiction, and in refusing to deliver copies of private, unofficial, and personal papers, while tendering to the Senate promptly all public and official papers and documents in the Departments, the President has walked in the path trodden by all his predecessors. George Washington, the first President, established the first precedent in a similar case and the record has been read in this debate to establish it.

Andrew Jackson more than once maintained the prerogatives of the Presidential office by refusing to comply with demands of the same character, and John Tyler and President Grant, and even Mr. Hayes, all in notable instances, the records of all which have been read in this debate by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], have done just what Mr. Cleveland has done so well in this case. Mr. Cleveland has illustrious company and an unbroken line of precedent to support him. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, with all his ability and research, and although challenged by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] to produce an instance in which a demand like this upon President Cleveland has been acceded to by a President of the United States, has failed to find one. He has not shown a single one. All such demands have from the beginning of this Government, the time of Washington, been repelled as invasions of the executive domain without a single exception. Whenever the question has been made it has been decided as Mr. Cleveland has determined it.

Mr. President, since I have been a member of this Senate, and it was during the administration of Mr. Hayes, the Senate was for two years under Democratic control. We could have hatched up plausible but dishonest pretexts for rejecting every nomination sent to the Senate by the Republican President. We could have embarrassed the administration of the Government by factious opposition, while protesting to the country that we favored a "calm and orderly" administration of the Government; but the Democratic majority pursued no such methods. They aided the Republican President by a prompt confirmation of his nominations, all Republican, and I remember no instance of a contest over a nomination involving any heat or feeling that did not originate between Republicans. All went on as smoothly as if the Senate had been in political accord with the President. Let the country mark the contrast now that the positions of parties are reversed. A Republican Senate absolutely refuses to act upon the nominations of the President, except upon conditions which require him to depart from all the precedents of his office, to sacrifice his convictions of constitutional duty, and his own self-respect.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. Mr. President, in the view I shall take of the resolutions before the Senate, I shall not attempt to recast any part of the great historic debate upon the question where the power of removal from office resides—whether in the President alone, or in the President and the Senate, or whether it is an implied power to be regulated by Congress. I shall rather aim to argue the question upon postulates derived from our political history, from undisputed constitutional principles, from the course of legislation, and from common sense—all of which will, I think, lead us to conclusions utterly at variance with the view substantially, though not avowedly, taken by the majority of our Judiciary Committee; for, strange to say, one of the greatest difficulties in this debate is to determine what is the real question before us.

Stripped of all the illusory power which words can be made to assume in order to conceal one's real aims, that view we hold and undertake to prove to be this: That when the President, in the recess of the Senate, has suspended an official to whose original appointment the advice and consent of the Senate was required, the Senate has the power, when considering the question of confirming his successor, to demand the President's reasons for such suspension.

Our Republican friends deny that they have raised any such issue, and assert that they have only asked for papers relating to the conduct and management of a given office during a given time. We none the less contend that their purpose is to reach the President's reasons, and that if such is not their purpose it would be the easiest thing in the world to say so. When further pressed to declare their real design, they reply that it may be this, it may be that, and it may be the other; and when they can make no other reply, we are informed that the President has no right to inquire what their purpose is, and that all he or his Cabinet officer has to do is to respond to their demand, regardless of what aim they may have in view. But, sir, we do not propose to allow ourselves to be parried in any such way.

We, as Democrats, are not willing to consent that the President of the United States, a coequal and co-ordinate branch of this Government, shall be degraded into a mere official clerk of the Senate, a mere machine who has no right to think, and whose unquestioning duty it is in silence to obey our behests. The senate of Rome, in the height of its grandeur, and when most imbued with its patrician spirit, could scarcely have treated a petty proconsul with less consideration and courtesy than Senators on this floor seem disposed to treat an independent branch of this Government, simply because it has dared to address to them a calm and polite message, claiming as its own certain letters which we imperiously demand, and which a Republican Attorney-General has officially declared to be its private property. Poor indeed in spirit and dwarfed into political insignificance must a President be when he dare not address a polite communication to this Senate upon what he thinks concerns the rights of his own high office, which the Senate itself has brought in question. If so vital a subject as the true boundary-line between great departments of this Government does not involve "the state of the Union," then indeed will it be difficult to find one that will.

Sir, we aver that if the object of the majority of the Judiciary Committee is to reach the President's reasons, then it is utterly illegal and inadmissible. We further insist that their refusal frankly to disclose their real purpose is an implied admission that it is what we charged it to be. We further contend that the whole history of this controversy, from its incipiency down to the present time, proves beyond a doubt that the objective point of the majority of the Judiciary Committee is to reach the President's reasons, or what they will be sure to consider such. When the first notes of the intended assault upon the President were sounded, we were told all along the line that he had announced his purpose not to remove any public officer without cause, and that the majority must have the President's reasons for suspensions, in order to see whether he had not removed faithful officials upon false or frivolous charges, and to vindicate the reputations of men thus unjustly accused. This cry we heard in committee-rooms, in the Senate, in street-cars, in hotels, in the public press, everywhere. After a while, the language of the demand was slightly modified, and we were told that they must have all papers connected with appointments and suspensions. And finally, after weeks of deliberation, under the lead of crafty counselors, came formal demands, not for reasons, not even for papers connected with suspensions, but for papers referring to the management and conduct of certain offices between certain dates, always covering the period between the 4th of March in the last year and the date of any given suspension, doubtless to be followed, if successful, by like demands in all similar cases.

Why Senators should pursue this sinuous method of attack is indeed strange, unless they mean to concede that they have no right to ask for the President's reasons, but that it is fair, manly, and legal to do by indirection what they have no earthly right to do in a straightforward manner. Sir, a fortress is no less attacked when sappers and miners are inch by inch undermining its walls than when a storming party mounts the deadly breach. In spite of all this skillful word-fencing, they know, we know, the world knows that their real object is to reach the President's reasons for suspensions, and thus to form a justification, upon either the grant or the refusal of their demand, for some ulterior purpose they may have in view. To show beyond the chance for denial that their object is to reach the President's reasons for suspensions, it is only necessary to listen for five minutes to one of the speeches on the other side, when you will hear such object either openly expressed or necessarily implied.

Has, then, the Senate the power to demand of the President his reasons for suspensions? In whatever form the majority of this body choose to phrase their demand, the same arguments which will negative the question just asked will show how illogical is their position. So far in the history of this country we rejoice, sir, that there is not here, as in some old effete monarchy of the East, any magic power in forms to override and control the very life and substance of things.

Now, Mr. President, the most cursory reader of our history knows that there have never been but two theories of construction with respect to this right of removal practically adopted and enforced. The one which obtained for seventy-eight years held that the President exercised an absolute and unqualified power to remove public officers at his discretion, subject only to an accountability to that great court of impeachment organized by the Constitution. The other theory declared that the power of removal was an implied power which Congress could regulate at its pleasure. As we all know, the first Congress, under the lead of Mr. Madison, declared the first of these theories to be the true construction of the Constitution. They did not attempt to confer that power by acts of Congress upon the President, but their acts were purely declarative that this right of removal was an integral part of executive power, which legislative acts could neither give nor take away. From that time to 1867 this power was everywhere practically conceded to be in the President. Text writers so classed it. No act of Congress ever attempted to restrain or qualify it. No judgment of any court ever called it in question. No statesman of any note ever even contended that the President could, without an act of legislative power, be compelled to render to the Senate the reasons for a removal. In 1826 the Senate, under the lead of Mr. Benton, in vain endeavored to have an act passed making it incumbent on the President to give such reasons, all the time conceding his right of removal. With a similar concession Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Calhoun strove, in 1835, to impose a like restraint, with a like failure. All these great statesmen conceded that without an act of Congress imposing some restraint the President could rightfully, as he had done from the beginning, exercise the absolute and unqualified power of removal. They attempted to impose a restraint, just such in effect as this body is now striving by its unassisted powers to arrogate to itself; but having failed in their effect it never occurred to their minds to claim that what they had in vain invoked the power of Congress to do the power of the Senate could alone virtually accomplish.

In fact, sir, before the act of 1867 was passed, there was just about as much ground for the doctrine that the Senate could drag the President to its bar and demand his reasons for removals as there is in physics for the notion that two solid bodies can occupy the same space at the same time. The Senate may, prior to that time, have asked for papers relating to removals, but the instances were few indeed. Only two cases seem to have been unearthed by the searching scrutiny which this controversy has aroused. One was the call upon Mr. Monroe, in 1822, for papers opposing the appointment of Irish as marshal, and the other was the call upon General Jackson, in the case of Wirtz, for like information. In the latter case we know that the request was indignantly refused; in the former, as the majority report does not state otherwise, we presume the call met a similar fate.

But in 1867 a Republican Congress, forced by the exigencies of their deadly conflict with Andrew Johnson, and flushed with the imperial power of a two-thirds majority, adopted for the first time the theory sought to be enforced in 1826 and in 1835, and proceeded not only to make it the duty of the President to assign reasons for removals, but also adopted other most stringent provisions, which placed the President at their feet and paralyzed the whole executive branch of the Government. So harsh and grating was this law, so severe the friction in the joints of Government, especially with respect to this very matter of the assignment of reasons, that in the year 1869 some of the ablest debaters on the Republican side, especially Senators Morton, Carpenter, and our President pro tempore, declared it to be onerous, cumbersome, and impossible of execution. Whatever differences might have then prevailed in Congress respecting the repeal of any other provision of the original tenure-of-office act of 1867, there was a practical unanimity as to the repeal of this obligation upon the President to send to the Senate his reasons for removals. This part of the act of 1867 was expressly intended to be repealed, and was beyond question repealed. The fact that an act of Congress was deemed necessary to impose such a duty upon the President is plain proof that no such duty was before incumbent on him, and that the Senate had no right or power, directly or indirectly, to impose it upon him. The fact that such a law stands repealed is proof beyond contradiction that the President is released from any such duty under the law, and is not to be drawn again by any act of Senatorial finesse within its folds. And we have before seen that he is bound by no law of custom or precedent in our antecedent history, but that, on the contrary, the theory then most widely prevalent, and the universal usage under that theory, rendered such an amenability of the President to the Senate too incongruous to be seriously entertained and too unreasonable to be admitted into practice.

But, sir, the argument does not stop here. The act of 1869 expressly empowered the President in his discretion to make suspensions. What earthly power, then, can challenge him in the exercise of his discretion, unless he has used it so corruptly as to call for impeachment? That discretion before the act of 1867 was unrestrained by any law, and since the act of 1869 no law on the statute-books speaks a syllable looking to the slightest restriction. Surely it needs no argument to show what common sense and solemn legal decisions affirm, that no court and no single branch of the legislative power can interfere, unless by impeachment, to call the President in any manner to account for the mode in which he has seen fit to exercise that discretion. We are guilty of a bold usurpation if we attempt to constitute ourselves his mentors, his guardians, and practically his masters, in the discharge of a duty strictly pertaining to the executive office, with which neither Constitution nor law gives us a right to interfere. Our rights and duties are solely confined to advice and consent with respect to appointments, whether we look to the Constitution or any law passed in pursuance thereof, unless it be the case of a term officer during the session of the Senate. We have not, therefore, a shadow of right to demand of the President his reasons for suspensions.

But, sir, Senators may again respond that they ask for no such reasons, but that they only demand the production of papers relating to the conduct and management of given offices between certain dates. Sir, the principle that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other does not alone obtain in mathematics. This demand, as they have made it, must bring to us, if it be obeyed, all papers connected with any charges against the suspended official, inasmuch as such charges plainly refer in some sense to his management of his office. Then the demand might as well be at once made for all papers relating to such charges against the suspended officer. Such we all know is their objective point, and it would be much more ingenuous at once and openly thus to make their demand. And still further, as their well-known purpose in getting at the charges in such papers is to reach the President's reasons for suspensions, it would be not only far more candid but vastly more fair to ask him at once for such reasons, for every one knows that as soon as the charges in those papers are read by Senators they will loudly protest that they were the President's reasons, although it is perfectly clear that he may have had other and controlling motives, derived from oral information or from evidences of incompetency or shortcomings otherwise supplied. And thus the grossest injustice may be done to the President by this brilliant device for obtaining his reasons. And being a mere device for doing indirectly what they virtually acknowledge they have no right to do directly, it is entitled to even less consideration than a direct demand itself.

If it were necessary to add anything further to the argument, it must be apparent to every candid mind, as a Republican Attorney-General in a reported opinion has said, that all letters to the President which have been written to enlighten his discretion upon the subject of removals are private papers, which he could, without challenge from any quarter, destroy as soon as received, or send back to their authors, or keep in his own possession, or, as is usually done, send to the proper Department to be briefed and kept for his own convenience, or could at any time withdraw and dispose of at his pleasure. They are in no respect public documents, showing the mode in which public business has been transacted, or whether the provisions of law or the rules of the Department have been observed. They are simple representations from outsiders as to their views of the fitness or unfitness of a man to be retained in office. To call such letters official documents would seem to be a piece of thorough red-tapeism, worthy only of a first-class circumlocution office.

In most cases such letters are written in confidence, and often, when statements are made in them with the utmost truthfulness and honesty of purpose, they would have never been made at all if it had been supposed they would have been blazoned forth to the world. Senators pass rules to prevent the disclosure of what they may say in this Chamber respecting the characters of the President's nominees. A committee of this body may in its discretion withhold all charges made against the President's nominee, and is never permitted at all to disclose the name of the author of such charges. Then Senators should not complain if the President declines to communicate to them what his friends have said to him about the characters of the appointees of a former administration, especially when the information is sought, not for the good of the public service but to enable his interrogators to score a political point against him. If secrecy is to be abolished let the process be begun right here in this body, which has ever been its chosen seat.

But, sir, an appeal has been made to precedents as settling this question, and, as we think, with most inconclusive effect. It is certainly the President's constitutional duty to give information to Congress of the state of the Union. Apart from this injunction a reasonable comity between the two branches of the Government would inspire the President to impart all information in his possession which would enlighten Congress in all matters of legislation. Such is the plain design of the duty laid upon the President in the Constitution and upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the Revised Statutes, and the rules of comity do no more and no less. That the President should have been constantly asked for such information was not only reasonable but clearly in accordance with law. That he should have been frequently asked by the Senate for information relative to treaties was in strict consistence with his constitutional relations to this body. That he should have, times without number, advised with the Senate with respect to his nominees for office is in conformity both with the spirit and letter of the Constitution. But the reasons which are apparent in all these cases utterly fail when it comes to removals or suspensions. Under the universal rule and practice before 1867 the removals were made under the unrestricted discretion of the President, and such is the case now with respect to suspensions under the plain and unchallenged meaning of the act of 1869.

A treaty is no treaty, and a nomination is no appointment, unless the Senate consents. A suspension is a suspension, whether the Senate consents or not. The Senate can not in any wise consider the question of a suspension unless a nomination is first before them. The only question before us under a pending nomination is the fitness or unfitness of the nominee, whether we look to the Constitution or any act of Congress. The charges that may have been made against the suspended officer can not enlighten us as to the nominee's fitness; all that their consideration can do is to fan the flame of partisanship and to cause the majority here, in a spirit of retaliation, to reject the President's nominee be he ever so good.

The call for all papers relative to the conduct and management of an office by a suspended officer, made in executive session while the question of the confirmation of his successor is pending, can in the nature of things have no reference to any proposed legislation. It must relate to the question of the confirmation of his successor, and to nothing else. If the Senate, through such papers, learns the ground of such suspension, it may, and if it acts in a partisan spirit doubtless will, reject the new nominee. The call for these papers, then, leading to no legislation which would alone justify it, but leading inevitably to what Senators on the other side will not claim they have any right to do—to a review and a judgment upon the President's discretion, we are utterly at a loss to know upon what foundation of reason or of law it can be based.

Mr. President, we were asked by one of the Senators from Ohio a few weeks ago whence came this new-fangled idea that the President can say what papers shall be sent to the Senate and what shall not? We answer: in the very nature and reason of things. There is an obligation, constitutional and legal, upon the President to send to the Senate all papers which may aid this body to legislate for the public welfare, and, if not incompatible with existing circumstances, all information relating to treaties. There is at least a high moral obligation upon the President to advise with the Senate, if requested, touching his nominations. But there is no obligation, constitutional, legal, or moral, upon him to give us any information relating to his reasons for suspensions. He who runs, it seems to me, can see the difference between the two kinds of information and the papers embodying them. The President, in whose custody such communications really are, and to whom they belong as much as any Senator's correspondence belongs to him, can not fail to see the distinction, and he owes the duty to his high office not to allow any inappropriate precedents or any far-fetched comparisons between as honest and unambitious a Chief Magistrate as we have ever had and the most perfidious and despotic king who ever sat on England's throne to mislead or drive him into impairing its rights and immunities.

No doubt, sir, thousands of precedents can be found where the President has imparted information respecting matters of legislation to the Senate at their request. No doubt hundreds of cases can be found where the President has given reasons why a nominee should be confirmed. But the majority of our Judiciary Committee have toiled in vain to find prior to 1867 a single case in which the Senate or one of its committees has ever made such a demand as they claim to be justified by precedents. They have brought to light two cases, it is true, where such a demand was made by committees of the House of Representatives; in the first of which, that of Sylvester in 1842, the Secretary evidently declined, as did Secretary Sherman in reply to a similar request of Mr. Conkling, to furnish letters which he considered confidential; and in the last of which the House, as the great national inquest, was evidently looking toward the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, who was then loudly accused of a corrupt use of patronage and of other offenses. In either of these or any like cases the House of Representatives could only call for such information with a view either to impeachment or new legislation; whereas our call can have only been made with reference to the exercise of our quasi-executive function, and, if it be inappropriate to that end, is utterly misplaced and inadmissible.

But, Mr. President, the majority report informs us that since the passage of the act of 1867 it has been usual for the Judiciary Committee to send to the proper Department a request similar to that sent to Mr. Garland, and that in no instance has the committee met with any denial till this time. But they fail to tell us that these requests were made of Republican administrations, which could only turn out Republicans to make room for Republicans, and when a suspension, presumably not being based upon political grounds, must have been for cause. Political friends of parties suspended under such circumstances naturally sought to know the grounds of suspension, which a President of their own faith could not well refuse to give, not as a matter of right, but of courtesy as well as policy. They also fail to tell us that none of the present Cabinet officers has refused to give to any suspended officer, or to any Senator representing him, information as to the charges made against him, only declining, as do our own committees under our own rules, to make known the authors of such charges. They also fail to tell us that if any committee of this Senate or Senator had politely requested of any head of Department papers relating to suspensions, and there had been reasonable ground for the belief that such request was bona fide made, looking to the good of the public service or even to the good name of the suspended official, such papers would have doubtless been granted, as in fact they were by several Departments in the early days of this session; but that when the majority of the Senate made such a demand as a matter of right, a claim which had hitherto never been heard of, and when they had set out on this line upon a crusade against the President, with a view to nothing else than gaining a political vantage ground in a trial of strength before the people, then the President and his friends deemed it proper for him to stand upon his rights and to recur to the true principles and ancient usages of our Government with respect to removals or suspensions.

A departure from such principles and usages had never arisen from any other cause than that comity which naturally led one branch of the Government to respond to a respectful request of another. But when the same information came to be demanded as of right and with a hostile intent, I do not believe that we ever had a President who would have yielded to such a claim. We have had one at least who would have rejected it in much more nervous language than Mr. Cleveland has used. That man was Andrew Jackson, who, as we were informed by the Senator from Vermont on the opening of this debate, responded to such a request (not a demand) with the curt reply that the Senate had better mind its own business and let his alone. It is very pertinent to inquire here why it was that when Andrew Jackson chided the Senate for impertinence in sending for his private letters, written to enlighten his own discretion in discharging his own executive functions, he was not arraigned before the country as trampling upon the Senate's rights and privileges? I know of no sufficient answer to the question, unless it be that certain Senators, filled with lofty ideas of Senatorial power, did not live in those days.

But, sir, the majority report insists that the Senate is specially called upon, both by the act of 1869 and by the President, in the case of every suspension, to advise and consent with regard to the removal of the suspended official, and therefore that they are entitled to all letters addressed to the President bearing upon his merits or demerits, so that their judgment may be informed about the propriety of his restoration to his office, as the President's discretion was enlightened touching his suspension. We deny that the last tenure-of-office act of 1869 either bears or was ever intended to bear any such construction. Section 1767 of the Revised Statutes provides that every term officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall serve out his term, unless sooner removed by and with such consent, except as in the next section provided. Then the next section, which is plainly intended to make an independent provision for the necessities of removals in the recess of the Senate, specially authorizes the President, in his discretion, to suspend any man during such recess, be he a term or a non-term officer, till the end of the next session of the Senate, and to nominate to that body at such next session a person in the place of the man suspended; and if the Senate during such next session shall refuse to advise and consent to the confirmation of the President's nominee, then the President shall nominate another person to the same session of the Senate.

The sole duty imposed upon the Senate under the terms of this law is to confirm or reject the President's nominee. And that this is also the primary and controlling purpose of the law is proved by the fact that although we pronounce the suspended officer as pure as snow in character and as to his duties perfection itself, we can not thereby restore him, but immediately upon our refusal to confirm the first nominee of the President the law calls upon the President to nominate a new man, whose rejection leads to the same result, and so on to the end of the session; not one word being said about the restoration of the suspended official, but such results being left to flow consequentially, if at all, from our failure upon a presumed honest effort to find a Presidential nominee whom we are willing to confirm. Does not this show most clearly that the design of the act of 1869 is simply to get a good officer in the place of the suspended party whom the President has pronunced not to be a man whom he can trust for some cause, either political or personal, to aid him in the execution of the laws; and that it is not intended to devolve upon the Senate the primary duty of trying and passing judgment on the suspended party and then of rejecting the President's nominee if such suspended officer is found in our judgment to be a good and faithful officer? The object of the act of 1867 was, on the contrary, by its express terms, to first try and pass judgment upon the person suspended, and to that end to force from the President all papers and information pertinent to such trial. The act of 1869 repealed, and was intended to repeal, all this, as its terms plainly declare; and yet Senators, by their artful constructions, are trying to inject into this act of 1869 all the obnoxious and repealed features of the act of 1867. Surely never did a miser part from his worshiped treasure more unwillingly than some Senators on this floor from the unnatural and dangerous powers which the convulsive energies of a political revolution accidentally threw into their hands.

To enable us the better to get an insight into the true construction of the act of 1869, let us suppose the end of the session reached to which the President is to send in his nomination in the case of a suspension, and let us further suppose that no confirmation of a Presidential nominee has been had. What sort of a restoration is this which the old incumbent will get? At the President's will it will be a fiction and not a fact—momentary, profitless, a mere apple of Sodom. According to the received construction, which the Senator from Vermont has quoted approvingly, the President can at once resuspend, and so the process may go on to the end of his term of office. And no one can doubt that the President will, and no one can blame him if he does, use every means the law gives him to prevent his political adversaries from factiously thrusting upon him an officer whom he has, for reasons satisfactory to himself, pronounced unsafe to be trusted by him in the execution of the laws.

And thus this beautiful specimen of legislation, which this Senate forced upon the country in spite of President Grant's protest and against an overwhelming majority of the other House, brings us to this issue, that a law which the majority of the Senate contends was intended to curb the power of removal by the President over all offices which, by the law of their creation, are to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate actually confers upon the President the power to fill such offices during almost his whole term of office without any such advice and consent at all. And so all this magnificent campaign inaugurated by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, this heavy bombardment of the White House by the Senator from Vermont, and the fiery assaults by the Senators from Iowa, Illinois, and Oregon, is to accomplish this wonderful result, and nothing more, that the Senate must have the President's private letters to help them to form a judgment as to the fitness of a suspended officer to be restored to his place, into which, after all, we can not put him, but can only lead the poor fellow to the door and there leave him shivering out in the cold. But our friends will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that they have fought a gallant battle, even if they have won a barren victory.

And now, Mr. President, what else can be the object and aim of this great strategic movement upon the Executive, unless it be a maneuvering for political position? From the able generalship under which the campaign is conducted and the flourish of trumpets with which the onset is preluded, the world is led to believe that some momentous enterprise is on foot, which will deeply stir the hearts of men and vitally affect the interests of the people. Yea, and so it is; for is not the fair fame of Republican officials at stake? Some evil-disposed speakers and some reckless newspapers, not having the fear of God and of the Republican party before their eyes, have dared, during the late Presidential campaign, to sing as a chorus to their speeches and writings "Turn the rascals out;" and therefore Republican Senators, fired with a righteous indignation, must spend months of time to demonstrate the falsity of a political battle-cry by ransacking the country over for affidavits proving how immaculate have been these martyrs to their political faith. They never tire of telling us, moreover, that President Cleveland has said he would turn out no man unless for cause, and as he has suspended hundreds of Republican officials before their terms expired we are bound to infer that he has received and sustained charges upon which these suspensions have been based. And Senators must have these papers so as to be able to vindicate their suspended friends from fraudulent accusation.

Now, sir, do not our Republican friends know that they are calling upon the President in effect to do what Republicans and Democrats in 1869 deliberately determined, by a solemn act of Congress, that the President should no longer be required to do? Do they not also know that they are voluntarily and illegally assuming, for partisan purposes, to do what the Senate and the other House declared it was impossible to do without a reckless waste of time which should be devoted to the honest business of the country? What our honored presiding officer then in debate declared "could not be practically enforced with a due regard to the public interests" for want of time during any session of Congress of any reasonable duration? What Senator Morton said "would impose upon the Senate a labor it can not perform, and which it would be physically impossible for it to discharge?" What Mr. Carpenter declared to be "too cumbrous for the Senate to dispose of?" We have been told that the President has sent to the Senate about six hundred and forty cases of suspensions out of the thousands of Presidential appointments in the country. If our committees attempt to investigate all such cases (and certainly it will not do in this righteous crusade to pretermit the case of a single one of their suffering innocents), a large portion of the time usually allotted to a long session must be given to this whitewashing process, which should be devoted to the pressing needs of public business.

But, sir, let us suppose these investigations begun. Do Senators for a moment suppose it to be possible that the President and the heads of Departments, aided by the knowledge of Senators and Representatives as to facts, have been so precipitate and reckless in their action that they have not been well assured as to the truth of charges in the most of such cases? Is it not probable, after full investigation by our committees, that there will be found good grounds of grave suspicion in many other cases? And now suppose that in some cases the charges can be disproved; it will not show that the President has acted unfairly, but only that he may have been misled. In many of these the parties accused would doubtless prefer that the charges should sleep forgotten or unknown in the pigeon-holes of a Department rather than that superserviceable friends should drag them to light and raise an uproar around their heads. In the very case before us—that of Duskin—the man never made any complaint and asks for no vindication. Why, then, I ask, should Senators desire to raise issues over charges made in letters to the President, when we do not even know that they were the real grounds of suspension, and when, if they were, the parties charged are seeking no investigation, and when, if they do, any one could have gone to the head of the Department and upon a polite request have learned what the charges were, so that the parties concerned could, if they had been able, have vindicated themselves before their neighbors and friends at home, where ninety-nine hundredths of them were alone ever heard of?

The purposes of vindication would have been thus more fully answered than by the waste on our part of months of time that belong to important legislative work. And such vindication could have been thus reached without calling upon the President to disgrace his high office by becoming a common informer before the country, and thereby stirring up strife and feuds all over the land. Our Republican friends are doubtless humane and sympathetic gentlemen, sensitively jealous of the fair fame of their suffering brethren; but I must confess I do not see how this crusade of theirs can accomplish any real private or public good. It would rather seem to be a most capital device to waste the public time and to foment private strife. And still they are quite as horrified at our unwillingness to help them on in their enterprise as was the immortal Stiggins over the profane refusal of Tony Weller to contribute toward the scheme of that reverend gentleman's society of lovely females to send flannel waistcoats and moral pocket-handkerchiefs to the shivering and benighted pickaninnies of the West Indies. It would be a piece of profanity to say that one scheme is about as suggestive of any real moral or physical good as the other. We will not therefore attempt the comparison.

But, Mr. President, it is not only the professed object of this demand upon the President to vindicate the fair fame of their martyred brethren, but it is no doubt also their aim to convict the President of being faithless to his professions as a civil-service reformer by showing he has, upon false or frivolous charges, or without any at all, removed good Republican officials and put Democrats in their places. To emphasize this accusation, they have over and over again alleged that Mr. Cleveland has pledged himself to turn no Republicans out of office without cause. So often and so confidently has this assertion been made that it has come to be accepted as an undoubted truth even among some of the President's friends. The President has told us what I always knew, that this charge is utterly untrue, and that in no public utterance has he said so in words, or even in substance, as the word "cause" is usually and properly understood. The President never expressed himself more emphatically on this subject than in his letter to Mr. Curtis just after his election. He then renewed his pledge to enforce the civil-service law; and he who says he has not kept his pledge must either be blind to passing events or too warped by party prejudice to speak the truth. He therein claimed that all offices connected with the policy of the administration of the Government were exempt from even the spirit of the civil-service law. He further stated that there were certain offices outside of that law which were so clearly of a purely clerical or ministerial nature as to be within its spirit, and that in his opinion incumbents of such offices, being faithful and efficient, should not be displaced, simply because they were Republicans, to make room for others, simply because they were Democrats. But he at the same time declared that all office-holders who had manifested more of the esprit du corps of soldiers fighting the battles of their party than of civilians intent upon the faithful discharge of duty—men who were ever prostituting their official character and position by acting as busy, blatant, and offensive partisans—would receive no favor at his hands. To incur his condemnation he has never said that an office-holder must be guilty of any special act of misfeasance or of nonfeasance, such as is ordinarily meant by the word "cause," and such as is described in the first tenure-of-office act as equivalent to that word. It was only necessary that they should be offensive partisans.

What then, Mr. President, becomes of this famous presumption that every man who has been suspended must, under the President's declared policy, be necessarily charged with some offense of a criminatory character? While he has never said he would only turn men out for such a cause, he has repeatedly stated that he would suspend for intemperate partisanship. When we remember that for twenty-four years prior to the 4th of March in the last year an appointment to office by a Republican President was generally equivalent to an enlistment to fight Republican battles in season and out of season, by all means known to the most approved (and sometimes unapproved) party tactics, the presumption is vastly stronger that any given suspension was made for such a political cause (which the most of our friends on the other side would consider an honor rather than a demerit) than for any cause importing a personal disgrace. The whole pretext, then, for this Republican onslaught upon the President is swept away. The whole groundwork of the famous protoplastic evolutionary speech of the Senator from Iowa dissolves into thin air, and the speech itself vanishes away with it, with all its portentous accusations that Democratic President, Cabinet, and Senators are engaged in a vile conspiracy to destroy the characters and reputations of American citizens. Like the Knight of La Mancha, he and his coadjutors have sallied forth to vindicate those whose reputations have never been assailed. They are fighting nothing but the figments of their own imaginations. But if driven from this ground, they take the other, that they will confirm no man nominated in the place of a person suspended solely for a political offense and with no charge of any personal misconduct or delinquency against him, then will Republican Senators be justly chargeable with an attempt to re-enact, out of the plentitude of their own power, all the repealed portion of the act of 1867, by requiring not only that the President shall be compelled to give his reasons, but that those reasons, in order to justify a suspension, shall import some dereliction in duty or offense against the law. Then Senators should not complain if they find the outside world charging that there is an attempt in this land of freedom to set up an odious oligarchy whose seat is to be the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that if the President could be made to give us his reasons for suspensions, it would turn out that very many of them would be found based upon this purely political ground. And when we consider the extremely partisan character of the service for the last twenty-four years, we scarcely think our Republican friends should show so bitter a spirit over the course the President has pursued. With a spirit of moderation which our Republican friends fail to appreciate, and which our Democratic friends find it most difficult to understand, Mr. Cleveland still keeps in office tens of thousands of Republicans, many of them having been bitter partisans during their official terms, now at the end of the first year of his administration; while scores of thousands of Democrats are pressing forward with a keen scent and a hunger sharpened by a long, long fast of twenty-five years, striving to enter the promised land. Men high in position, the chosen leaders of their party, with great ardor and consummate skill, are marshaling these thronging and expectant hosts, and are laying siege to the lone man who is guarding the fort of civil-service reform. Like some great leader in one of the remarkable awakenings of the human mind, he stands the embodiment of the spirit of reform; because he believes that the methods of the fathers of the Republic are essential to the purity and permanence of our Government; because he believes that the warnings of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun against the dangers of a sweeping change in the offices upon every change of political dynasty are full of the deepest significance; because he believes that the reasons which in 1882 led large majorities in both Houses of Congress to adopt the present civil-service law were sound and conclusive; because he believes that, unless party platforms are party frauds, the professed creeds of the two great parties of the country in 1884 demonstrated that a large majority of the people of the country are in favor of this species of reform, and finally, because in his inmost convictions he believes he is right.

I must confess, Mr. President, I can discern nothing great or noble, nothing but the littleness of partisan politics, when I see the President's political adversaries striving by every imaginable device, by every species of partisan misrepresentation and special pleading, to cover over with the disgraceful mantle of an imputed hypocrisy a Chief Magistrate who, in the midst of such unprecedented trials and innumerable obstacles from friends and foes, stands firm as a rock in the defense of a principle he feels to be right and which such multitudes of patriotic men believe to be the last refuge of good and honest government. And I must say to the President's friends who are not in full accord with him on this line of policy that I see nothing in his principles or in his policy to provoke either derision or invective. We who are Democrats and you who are Republicans voted for candidates upon platforms which professed loyalty to civil-service reform. Whatever our status then may be on this question it behooves us to remember he at least is consistent.

Sir, much harsh criticism has been poured upon the President's expressed intention to hold offensive partisanship as a ground for suspension. I must confess I can not see, upon the principles of civil-service reform, which he fully avows, that his position on this point is untenable, much less deserving of the contemptuous rejection awarded it by many. To the man who adopts the creed, which, upon its first annunciation in this body, was received with words of deep condemnation, to say nothing of alarm, that "to the victors belong the spoils," the President's attitude doubtless looks absurd. He who believes at this day that Mr. Cleveland in any degree adheres to this stalwart creed of politics must be a doubting Thomas of the first water. He believes, as did Mr. Jefferson, that a public office is in fact and not in name a public trust, and that a public officer should devote himself to the duties of his office and not to party work. He believes with all the fathers of the Republic, and with Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and hosts of our ablest and purest statesmen, that an immense army of office-holders, drilled, organized, and equipped to fight the battles of their party, would be a most powerful engine to overthrow the liberties of a free country; and that men who are paid out of the public Treasury to do the whole people's work have no right to use their time and the influence, money and prestige which their official positions give them to control the elections of the country.

He believes that this immense army, dependent for the very means of existence upon one will which gave and can take away their livelihood, could be most effectually used to perpetuate power and to become the bulwark of tyranny. Hence he desires to divorce official life from the bitterness and intensity of party strife. It is not his aim to deprive the citizen of his true freedom of thought or action; but he does desire to free him from a political thraldom which will compel him not only to vote, but to work and give for the party ticket or to lose the bread upon which he feeds. To the man who can and will think it is plain that the attitude of the President with respect to offensive partisanship has no reference to any excess of political zeal of any officer before his induction into office. It is solely with official intermeddling with the manipulations of party politics that he proposes to deal.

Mr. President, although I can not, in anything I have said or can say, speak ex cathedra, yet looking over the list of suspended office-holders as they stand on the files of the Senate, I feel very sure that in a large number of cases the changes have been made on this ground of offensive partisanship. And I feel sure, too, that the lists of office-holders have not been yet fully purged. While this may afford to our Democratic brethren comfortable ground for hope of a further enjoyment of the flesh-pots of Egypt, it can be no just ground of complaint to our Republican friends of the stalwart class, who profess that they can look on with perfect equanimity while, for political reasons, the guillotine is doing its work and the heads of their partisan followers are falling into the basket. For if these men do not die a political death for political reasons, then no man ever did or ever can.

And, in fact, no Republican of any stripe can justly find fault with the mild and generous course of President Cleveland with respect to suspensions, except those pre-eminently fair-minded and unselfish men who, not content that their party friends on the civil lists have had a monopoly of the vast patronage of this country for twenty-four years and have consumed some $600,000,000 of the public money, still expect and desire that the civil-service law, like an angel with a flaming sword, shall continue to guard their paradise of office-holding against the intrusion of unhallowed Democratic feet. When we hear such men singing the praises of the civil-service law and demanding that the President shall extend its reach far beyond its actual scope simply to keep their friends in office, we, as Democrats, are thankful for the rule of offensive partisanship, which is our key at once to open the door of the promised land and to close the mouths of our stalwart friends, who rejoice in martyrdom for opinion's sake.

And now, Mr. President, if the executive department, which is a co-equal and co-ordinate branch of our Government, does not choose to allow itself to be catechised by us as to its reasons for exercising its discretion in a matter exclusively appertaining to its own duties, what do our Republican friends propose to do about it? Warning, threatening notes have been already heard that they may conclude to refuse confirmation to all appointments in cases of suspensions, and to appeal to the country for their vindication. We accept the issue. We hold such a position to be that of obstructionists, of men who by the rule of numbers and therefore of sheer force, and not by virtue of law or right, are doing their best to stop the wheels of Government. We are convinced that a large majority of the people of this country—all the Democrats and many Republicans—hold to the doctrine that the power of removal rightfully belongs to the President, and that Congress has no right to pass laws to hamper and control that power; and a fortiori, that this Senate has no right, by any device in lieu of such law, to arrogate any part of such power to itself. We believe further that the people fully understand the demands you have made upon the President through the heads of Departments—that they consist on the one hand of nothing but a deceptive and misleading form of words, and on the other of nothing but misunderstood and misapplied precedents.

We feel assured, too, that the adoption of the tenure-of-office act of 1867 was not the deliberate choice of the American people, but was foisted upon the Government as a revolutionary measure in revolutionary times. We know that Congress in 1869, in partial obedience to the demands of the people, repealed the worst features of the act of 1867. We know that General Grant in less than twelve months from the passage of the act of 1869, mild as it comparatively is, declared it to be "inconsistent with a faithful and efficient administration of government." We know that in December, 1869, the House of Representatives, coming fresh from the people, voted by a majority of 6 to 1 to wipe out the last vestige or the tenure-of-office acts and to leave the President with his full power of removal, as he had always, except for two years, possessed it; and that again in 1872 another House of Representatives, breathing the will of an earnest people, reiterated the demand for repeal by a most decided vote. While the people have beheld the Senate thus holding on with a tenacious grasp to what so large a majority believe to be, even in its minimized form, a usurped power, we have seen President after President—Garfield, Arthur, Cleveland—all patriotically and unselfishly indorsing the passage of civil-service laws, whereby the control of their administrations over appointments would be abridged, because they believed that the purity and efficiency of the service could be thus promoted. The people have seen, too, with no slight disapproval, the ease with which the President's purely executive power of removal from office could, under a law professing to regulate it, be practically annihilated and usurped by the Senate. And they know full well that it is the branch of the Government which is the least popular in its character that is ever seeking to enlarge its powers and is most loath to unloose its hold upon whatever it has once managed to inclose within its grasp.

And having seen all this enacted before their eyes and having demanded and obtained the repeal of one of the most obnoxious provisions of the first tenure-of-office act, whereby the President was compelled to assign his reasons for suspensions, we feel doubly sure that the people will indignantly repudiate the attempt now being made by a majority of the Judiciary Committee, by a mere device, by a trick of words, to bring into renewed life what they thought a solemn act of Congress had stamped out of existence. Sir, the gage of battle which some Republican leaders at least have thrown down we promptly take up, feeling fully assured of a successful issue before the tribunal of the people.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland in his very logical and able speech, which I did not care to interrupt while he was progressing, seemed to wonder why Mr. Duskin was not here contending for himself. The Senator from Vermont and all the Judiciary Committee, the present Attorney-General being then one of them, know very well that Mr. Duskin was nominated in March, 1881, and the Senate did not see fit to confirm him. He was again appointed after the adjournment of that session of the Senate and nominated in October, 1881, and the Senator from Vermont did not feel justified even in reporting him to the Senate for confirmation at that special session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order as a matter of duty. The Senator is violating the rules of the Senate in referring to proceedings in executive session.

Mr. BECK. There is no executive session here involved. The records show and the public papers show three nominations of Duskin; and it was because the Senator from Vermont knew that he was unworthy that he expected to entrap this Executive into a compliance with——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I again rise to a question of order.

Mr. BECK. I will submit to the question of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Kentucky has stated that the Senator from Vermont did not feel justified in reporting a certain nomination in executive session.

Mr. BECK. He did not do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the Senator to order, Mr. President, and I say that the Senator from Kentucky is out of order in stating any such thing, whether it be true or false, which I do not remember.

Mr. BECK. I insist that nominations are public acts, and the public press of the country shows the fact that Mr. Duskin was nominated in March, 1881, again in October, 1881, and again in December, 1881, and that his nomination was not acted upon by the Senate until December, 1881, and the public press of the country shows it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not what the Senator stated. He stated that the Senator from Vermont did not feel justified in making a certain report in executive session. That I state, Mr. President, is out of order, and I ask the Chair to decide it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the Senator from Kentucky, if he desires to keep within the rules of order, can not properly mention here what has occurred in executive session.

Mr. BECK. I did not speak of anything that occurred in executive session. I spoke of the public fact that the Senator from Vermont was chairman of the Judiciary Committee during the sessions of March, 1881, of October, 1881, and of December, 1881, and twice the records and the public press show that he did not see fit to act upon this man's name.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Again the Senator is out of order, if the Chair will enforce the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has an undoubted right to refer to public facts such as a nomination, but——

Mr. BECK. And to-morrow I will prove the public fact I state by the press of the country.

Now I will go further. The records of an investigation held in the House of Representatives, which are published and which I will produce, show that in his connection with Strobach, the marshal, he was an utterly unfit man to hold the place from which he was removed, and the Senator from Vermont himself knows that fact. And I think I will produce the record from the then Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Brewster, a Republican Attorney-General, verifying that fact; and I hope in executive session to require and by a vote of the Senate to compel the Senator from Vermont to produce evidence which he has before his own committee, to show the unfitness of that man to hold any place of honor, profit, or trust. And I hope to prove that his effort to make the issue in this case in regard to Duskin was because he believed Duskin's case was so bad that the Democratic administration would be glad to prove how bad it was, and then he could claim it as a precedent in good cases. I hope to prove that all this movement now made with such a flourish of trumpets—no, I will not say what I expect to prove, for I can not do it perhaps in parliamentary language.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must leave entirely in silence what the Senator from Kentucky has stated in regard to affairs in executive session. I feel bound in honor not to make any allusion to any such subjects. The ideas of Senatorial honor, under the rules, of the Senator from Kentucky and my own are entirely different. Perhaps mine are wrong; perhaps his are right. Every Senator is sworn to a faithful performance of his duty as a Senator according to the regulations of the Senate that are made under the Constitution. If the Senator from Kentucky thinks it is honorable to garble and misstate the existence of circumstances occurring with closed doors of course I have no criticism to make upon his sense of what is honorable and right. I can not under the rules of the Senate and my oath make any reference to what has taken place under any circumstances when the doors are closed. Therefore I can make no reply to what the Senator from Kentucky has said on the subject to which he has alluded that transpired in executive session.

As to the other part of the affair, of what the reports in the Attorney-General's Office will show about Mr. Duskin——

Mr. BECK. I did not say the Attorney-General's Office; I said in the Committee on the Judiciary of which the Senator is chairman.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What the Senator from Kentucky said was that a report made to or by Mr. Brewster, an Attorney-General of the United States, somewhere and at some time, would show a certain thing. I can not allude to what the Judiciary Committee has or has not done. When some day I have leave to allude to it, I will endeavor to defend the honor of that committee and each one of its members; but I shall not violate my oath or my honor by doing it now, whatever other gentlemen may choose to do.

Now, then, if the reports in the Attorney-General's Office in the time of Mr. Brewster or any other time show that Mr. Duskin is or is not a good officer, I do not know, and I do not care. If there be reports in the Attorney-General's Office concerning Mr. Duskin, it was precisely those things that the Senate desired to know when it passed its resolution. It appears that the Senator from Kentucky can get at what the Attorney-General and the President of the United States consider to be confidential and private communications, when the Senate of the United States can not; and that is an advantage which the Senator from the State of Kentucky has over the body of which he is a member; and that is undoubtedly an advantage which the administration considers to be, as all the Democratic Senators do I presume, of very considerable importance.

But what the Senator from Kentucky can get it appears that the Senate can not. What the Senate asked, and what it only asked for, was a report of official papers and documents on file in the Department of Justice respecting the conduct and management of an office covering a period of time embracing six months of a suspended officer and six months of the officer whom we are asked to appoint, in order that the Senate might see how this office in the public service had been managed by its respective occupants, whether money had been embezzled, whether false indictments had been brought, or whether the office had been, under both of them, or either of them, well and honestly administered. That is what the Senate asked the Attorney-General to report, and nothing else.

Now if, as the Senator from Kentucky states, Mr. Duskin has been a bad officer and a bad man, it is of the highest importance for every reason, which I need not go into in detail, that not only the Senate of the United States but the House of Representatives should know it; and how papers relating to anything that he has done in the nature of misconduct either in office or out of office connected with public affairs can be confidential private communications that belong to the President alone I am quite unable to understand. But I did not intend to go further into this business now than to make the statement that I have.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator from Vermont that his resolution, as I understand it, directed to the Attorney-General, only extends, I think, to the 1st day of January, 1885, and I desire to say to him further that I have never seen a paper in the Attorney-General's office relative to Mr. Duskin, nor have I ever asked to see one, nor have I ever spoken to the President of the United States in regard to Mr. Duskin; and, as to my honor and my oath, I hope they are as sacred as those of the Senator from Vermont. If they were not at least as good as his I should not have as much regard for myself as I have. I propose to stand upon my integrity as a man and a Senator, and I say that a forty-parson power would not do justice to much of the hypocrisy that is now presented to the Senate under the pretense of desiring to see public justice!

Duskin was known to be an unfit man for the place he occupied, and nobody knows it better than the Senator from Vermont. He selected this particular case, in my judgment, because he believed that the executive power knowing that Duskin was unfit, and knowing that the Springer resolution and the Springer investigation connected him with Strobach, the marshal of Southern Alabama, to such an extent as to show that he was unfit to retain his place, and knowing that the present Attorney-General, then a member of his committee, was as well aware of that fact as he is, he would develop the unfitness of that man, and that would give him an excuse in other cases in order to bring scandal before the country to seek to make the struggle to obtain what he knows and what the country knows and what the Senate knows he has no right to demand from the Executive, who has been given an absolute discretion over the power of suspension. When I said to the Senator from Maryland that notwithstanding the able and exhaustive speech he had made showing the absurdity of this effort, he was not aware perhaps of how cunningly this game had been worked up hoping to get the executive officers in a trap, knowing that they had an absolutely good case against Duskin, the Senator from Vermont had to rise and talk about his honor and his oath and his integrity and to compare them with mine. I am willing to stand by the comparison. Thank God, whatever I say I say boldly, openly; I mean what I say. I do not stand on the corners of the street and say, "Thank God, I am not as other men," and pray aloud to make men believe that I have all the virtue and all the integrity and all the godliness extant.

When I meet a great public question, I meet it; I meet it fairly. I may make blunders, and I may make mistakes, but I have more respect for the man who meets his enemy in the open field and either knocks him down or takes a fair knock-down, than I have for the man who stabs his brother under the fifth rib when he is taking him by the hand and asking him, "How is it with thee, my brother?" I do not believe in secret ways. I do not believe in phariseeism. I do not believe in hypocrisy. I do not believe in circumventing anybody. And I believe I will move now, in order to see whether I am stating what was not true or not—and if I can not move it now I will at the first opportunity—that all the proceedings in March, 1881, all the proceedings in October, 1881, all the proceedings in December, 1881, all the papers filed in the Judiciary Committee, and all the proceedings had before the Judiciary Committee in the case of the nomination of Duskin shall be made public so that the country can judge whether what I say is true or not.

If I have falsified anything I will take it back; and if I have not I want a chance to prove it now, since comparisons are made between the oath and the honor of the Senator from Vermont and of myself. I make that motion now and will let it lie over until to-morrow morning, or I will do it in the first executive session if it is not in order to do it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the motion is not in order now, but the Senator may ask unanimous consent of the Senate to make it.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order in open session.

Mr. BECK. I shall move that the nominations which were discussed in March, 1881, October, 1881, and December, 1881, and all the papers and journals and records made in the Committee on the Judiciary in the Duskin case be made public.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That motion is not in order in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that as the motion itself will lead necessarily to a violation of the rules it must be made in executive session.

Mr. BECK. I shall make it the first executive session when I shall have a right to make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending another question it is not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I shall undoubtedly agree with the Senator from Kentucky, as I do, in a very large part of what he has said. When he said that he does not pretend to be better than other men, I am bound to agree with him. Yes; I am bound to agree with him; it would be impolite not to do so. When he said that he compares honor, I agree with him about that. He has his own views of what is honorable, and I have mine. I suppose, however, both being democrats, we are both entitled to our opinions as to what is honorable.

All that the Senator said was simply a plain, manifest, I will not say intended, violation of the rules and orders of the Senate in his referring to considerations of reports of committees or want of reports of committees in executive session. Perhaps the Senator is not conscious that he violated the rules in that regard. I doubt that he is, because everything provided by our rules is the right thing at the right time and in the right way. But he did that thing, and it was in respect of that that I called the attention of the Chair.

Mr. BECK. Where did the Senator from Vermont get the Thurman letter which he read the other day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Vermont got it from the letter-books of the Judiciary Committee under an order of the Senate, made after lying over one day on the objection of the Senator from Delaware and by vote the next day, the Senator from Delaware saying that he was perfectly satisfied that it should be done. The Senator from Vermont therefore in getting the letter of Judge Thurman got it under the order of the Senate taking off the injunction of secrecy from it. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky can see the distinction. I think he can.

Mr. BECK. I can see a barn, but I can not see a fly on a barn-door and not see the barn, I take it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly the Senator has seen a good many barns, I have no doubt; but I should be obliged to say he had not seen much of anything else, the way he goes on.

Mr. BECK. I have not seen the fly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the Senator never takes anything on the fly. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. Nor on the sly either. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I come again, Mr. President, to Duskin. The Senator from Kentucky says that this particular resolution of the Senate was devised, as he has now discovered, to entrap the President and the Attorney-General into reporting the official facts on file in the Department of Justice which show that Duskin is an improper officer, in order to make a precedent for entrapping the President and Attorney-General into reporting on other cases where they have slaughtered a man upon charges, on the invitation of the Postmaster-General or somebody else, that are false and fabricated; and that therefore the administration is going to be unveiled before the people of the United States by being entrapped into telling the truth about a bad officer, and so be led to tell the truth about a good officer. That certainly is an amazing attitude for the administration to occupy, and I take it the Senator from Kentucky represents it on this occasion. It will not give the official information that it possesses on the files of that Department about a citizen whom it asks us to remove or assist in removing, because giving that official information in a case that we should be able to act upon if we knew the facts that are upon the papers, for fear that in another instance, where an officer has been accused falsely and by invited perjury of offenses that he never committed, the conduct of the administration will be brought into reproach. That is its attitude, and I will leave it just there, Mr. President.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4 to the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; that it had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 6, and 7, and that it had agreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 5, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5219) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city; and

A bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that House bill 5893 with the action of the House of Representatives be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill with the action of the House of Representatives on the Senate amendments will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, with the consent of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin retaining the floor, on the resolutions reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions.

There was no objection.

The Journal was approved as read.

RICHARD JOSEPH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a list of suspensions made by the late First Comptroller in the accounts of Richard Joseph, disbursing clerk of the Interior Department, and recommending legislation conferring authority to pass to the account of said clerk the amounts suspended; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

EXPENDITURES OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting a statement of expenditures for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS FROM SENATE REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the House of the following titles, with Senate amendments; which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of The Postal Laws and Regulations—to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were read twice, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 1210) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make sale of certain lands of the Umatilla reservation in Oregon to William S. Byers and others and to issue patent therefor—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF A REPORT.

By unanimous consent the Committee on the Public Lands obtained leave to withdraw Report No. 965, in reference to fresh water on the Colorado desert.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DIBBLE, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GILFILLAN, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. COMPTON, indefinitely.

To Mr. NORWOOD, for ten days, on account of important business.

HEIRS AT LAW OF JAMES STEWART.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 275) for the relief of William D. Stewart and others, heirs at law of James Stewart, deceased, and that it be put upon its passage. It is a bill on the Private Calendar, and I think it can elicit no discussion.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to William D. Stewart, Thomas H. Stewart, William D. Stewart (guardian of the minor children of James Stewart, jr., deceased), M. F. Turner, R. M. McMillan, M. J. Powdon, and E. A. Dodd, heirs at law of James Stewart, deceased, of the county of Sumter and State of Georgia, the sum of $60 each, being the amount paid by each of said persons to the United States as excise tax on succession to property as heirs at law of said James Stewart, deceased, when in fact they were not liable for any sum whatever.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $420 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said claim.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] had better explain the bill.

Mr. CRISP. The persons named in this bill are the heirs at law of James Stewart, deceased. Mr. Stewart died intestate, leaving a considerable estate, consisting mainly of realty. There was existing a mortgage given by him upon this estate. The beneficiaries mentioned in this bill, his heirs at law, succeeded to the property covered by the mortgage and paid the amount of $60 each as a succession tax. Soon thereafter the mortgage was foreclosed in the circuit court of the United States, and under the judgment of foreclosure the property was sold as the property of the ancestor, James Stewart, so that these heirs in fact succeeded to nothing; they were ousted and evicted. When application was made to the Treasury Department for the refunding of the tax, the reply was made that the money would be refunded but for the statute of limitations, which required that application for the refunding should be made within two years. The heirs could not make the application in two years, because the final judgment that evicted them was not had until after the lapse of that time. This bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims, and I think there can be no objection to its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIRECT TAX.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and ask its present consideration.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 12, 1886.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish to the House a statement of the account, as it appears from the books of the Treasury, between the United States and the several States and Territories of the direct tax levied and apportioned to the States and Territories by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, with the balances due from or unpaid by any State or Territory to the United States, and a detailed statement of the assessment and collection of any portion of said tax in any State or Territory; also a statement of any set-off of claims due to the States and Territories and applied on such tax, together with such information as will show the condition of the account."

The Committee on the Judiciary report the accompanying resolution back to the House and recommend its adoption. We think the information requested important, as bearing upon several bills pending before the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CASWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS AT FRIDAY EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the special order of the House of January 15, 1886, amended by inserting the words "granting pensions," after the word "bills," in the third line, so as to make the order conform to what the House supposed it to be and what has been the uniform practice in reference to Friday evening sessions. If anybody desires I shall be glad to explain the reason why this is necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, there was some business done at the session last Friday evening which did not come within the order or the practice which usually governs at such sessions, and I understand that the proposed amendment is intended to guard against that occurring again.

My understanding of the original resolution as offered and adopted was that the business of the Friday evening sessions should be confined to pensions and should not extend to claims.

The SPEAKER. To pensions and bills removing political disabilities.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; to both classes of pensions, but not to claims.

Mr. ROGERS. If the House will permit, I wish to make a brief statement, which I think will enable every member to understand this matter. By some inadvertence a claim reached one of the pension committees—either the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions—and was reported back by the committee. That claim came up for consideration at the Friday evening session. Now, the House never intended that any measure should come up at the Friday night sessions except bills granting pensions (reported either by the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Pensions) and bills for the removal of political disabilities. Certainly it was never intended that a private claim should be considered at one of those evening sessions, when very few members are present, and when practically nothing is done except by consent. With the amendment proposed the order will read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills granting pensions reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only be considered.

This will be the form of the order if the amendment be adopted; and it is the spirit and intention of the existing order. I propose only to insert the two words "granting pensions," so that no bill can be taken up at a Friday night session except bills granting pensions and bills removing political disabilities.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. ROGERS. That was the original understanding.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to know, and I think the House would like to know, whether it is not the fact that the "claim" to which the gentleman from Arkansas has referred was of this nature: A pension certificate was issued, and before the vouchers were signed the proposed beneficiary of the pension died, and the heirs or legal representatives came to Congress and asked relief. The bill referred to proposed to give to these persons the amount which had been found due to the original applicant for a pension. The bill when introduced was referred to one of the pension committees. I do not think it was our committee, the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for I think we have at all times refused to consider such bills. I wish that this matter may be understood by the House in order that it may clearly appear that neither of the pension committees has undertaken to assume jurisdiction of any matters not legitimately referred to it. This was a claim growing out of an application for a pension.

I believe I represent the sentiment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions when I say we do not want to take jurisdiction of cases like that to which I have just referred; nor do we intend, if it can be avoided, that such claims be passed at Friday evening sessions. We desire that those sessions be devoted to the relief of pensioners; and I believe the records of those sessions will bear me out in the statement that the members of those several committees have endeavored to carry out in good faith the intention of the House in ordering those sessions.

The SPEAKER. This debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HATCH. As chairman of the Committee of the Whole at the Friday night session I ask the indulgence of the House to make a brief explanation in regard to this bill. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] assumes that the bill to which he refers is simply a private claim, and should have been referred to the Committee on Claims. The history of the bill, as it will be found in the RECORD of last Saturday morning, is just this: The bill when introduced was first referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which committee returned it to the House for a change of reference; and it was, by direction of the Speaker, referred to the Committee on Pensions, by which committee it was reported to the House. When the question was raised on last Friday night, the Chair decided that as the bill was on the Private Calendar and had been reported from the Committee on Pensions it was embraced within the order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair must first ascertain whether there is objection to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. RYAN. I desire to ascertain what the effect of this proposed modification will be. If it is what I suppose, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the order be modified as proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, the sessions of Friday after the recess will be devoted exclusively to the consideration of private bills granting pensions reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Pensions, and bills removing disabilities reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RYAN. But suppose, as has happened in several instances, a bill which relates to a pension that has been granted to a person already deceased be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, would that be excluded?

The SPEAKER. Unless it were a bill granting a pension it would be excluded.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. RYAN. Well, I shall not object.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. BEACH. I call for the regular order. I shall object.

PETROLEUM AND LEAF-TOBACCO.

Mr. WAIT. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to submit the privileged report which I send to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 1, 1886.

Mr. BUCK submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the recent correspondence and dispatches between the Secretary of State and the minister of the United States at The Hague, touching the subject of taxation of petroleum in Holland and in the Dutch colonies and that of the export therefrom of leaf-tobacco to the United States."

Attest:

JOHN B. CLARK, JR., Clerk.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution calling for copies of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the United States minister at The Hague, submit the following report:

The correspondence called for relates to the proposed measures of retaliation on the part of the Government of the Netherlands by way of an increased duty on petroleum imported into that country from the United States by reason of the duty imposed by the United States on leaf-tobacco. The committee are of opinion that the information contained in this correspondence should be in possession of the House of Representatives, as it concerns the subject-matter of a bill (H. R. 4434) relating to duties on tobacco; and they therefore recommend the adoption of said resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the committee.
The resolution was adopted.
Mr. WAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded and insisted on, committees will now be called for reports for reference.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1264) for the relief of George H. Roberts, administrator of the estate of William B. Thayer, deceased, the surviving partner of Thayer Brothers, and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HARRY I. TODD.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (S. 30) in lieu of H. R. 874, for the relief of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

By unanimous consent, House bill No. 874 was laid on the table.

DAVID L. BRAINARD AND OTHERS.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 1541) for the relief of David L. Brainard and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DAVID WARD.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4388) for the relief of David Ward; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EDWAY A. GRANT.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2817) for the relief of Edway A. Grant; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. LIZZIE D. CLARKE.

Mr. DOUGHERTY, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clarke; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LUCY ANN LEE AND ALLEN G. LEE.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL (by Mr. RICHARDSON), from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 100) for the relief of Lucy Ann Lee and Allen G. Lee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN M. HIGGINS.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4180) for the relief of John M. Higgins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table.

A bill (H. R. 26) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes.

A bill (H. R. 283) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and other court officials, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 1712) to abolish fees and perquisites of the United States district attorneys, marshals, clerks, commissioners, and deputy marshals, and provide salaries for the same;

A bill (H. R. 1718) fixing the compensation of United States marshals and district attorneys;

A bill (H. R. 3607) fixing the compensation of jurors in United States courts;

A bill (H. R. 4639) to abolish fees and perquisites of United States district attorneys, marshals, clerks, commissioners, and deputy marshals, and provide salaries for the same;

A bill (H. R. 5500) fixing the compensation of United States marshals and deputies, and for other purposes;

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, also reported, in lieu of the foregoing bills laid on the table, a bill (H. R. 6977) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GIBSON. This bill is reported by the instruction of the committee, with the understanding that when it comes up for consideration some of the members of the committee may desire to move to alter in individual cases the fees provided in the bill.

ASSISTANT CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINER.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Civil Service Reform, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5216) to provide an assistant civil-service examiner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN ERPELDING.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Patents, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 4454, a bill (H. R. 6978) for the relief of John Erpelding and Nicolaus J. Erpelding, administrators of the estate of Nicolaus Erpelding; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

By unanimous consent House bill 4454 was laid on the table.

BARGE MICHIGAN.

Mr. TARSNEY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4968) to authorize and direct the registry and enrollment of the barge Michigan, of Alpena, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROSE A. M'MANUS.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4884) granting a pension to Rose A. McManus; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. OCTAVE PAVY.

On motion of Mr. NEECE, by unanimous consent the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5136) granting a pension to Mrs. Octave Pavy; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5509) for the relief of St. Patrick's church, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ST. MARK'S PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1993) for the relief of St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal church, in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees begins at two minutes after 1 o'clock.

CLAIM OF FLORIDA.

Mr. DOUGHERTY (when the Committee on Claims was called) said:

By direction of the Committee on Claims I move that the House resolve itself into committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3877) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to make a statement in regard to this bill. The Committee on Claims directed that this bill be called up first; but they desire within the hour to take up another bill, and it was understood that the consideration of this bill should not be prolonged so as to prevent the consideration of the other.

The SPEAKER. That is an understanding among the members of the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was understood, however, that the committee did not give consent that this bill take up the whole time allowed to the committee. If the bill should be antagonized so as to threaten to extend beyond the hour, the committee will ask that the bill be laid aside or withdrawn in order that the other bill may be taken up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill indicated.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But under no agreement.

The SPEAKER. That is a mere statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The motion of Mr. DOUGHERTY was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3877) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas under the joint resolution of Congress approved March 3, 1881, directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claim of the State of Florida against the United States for the suppression of Indian hostilities between the years 1855 and 1860, the said Secretary of War did investigate said claim, and ascertained the amount due to the said State to be $224,648.09, as returned to Congress in the letter of the Secretary of War dated May 22, 1882, in Executive Document No. 203; and

Whereas there were certain items in said State claim which the Judge-Advocate of the United States Army deemed best to "be passed upon by the accounting officers of the Treasury, under proper equitable rules provided by legislation in that behalf;" and

Whereas there is now held by the Treasury of the United States, in trust for the Indian trust fund, certain bonds of the State of Florida aggregating the sum of $132,000; and

Whereas there has been credited upon the account of said bonds of the State of Florida certain moneys due said State under the act approved March 3, 1845, entitled "An act supplemental to the act for the admission of Florida and Iowa into the Union, and for other purposes;" and

Whereas certain other moneys are due said State under the act approved March 2, 1855, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of swamp and overflowed lands:" Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of the said State of Florida, as found and reported in said letter of the Secretary of War dated March 22, 1882, and under the acts above cited, and to pay to the said State such sum of money as he may find to be due the said State (under the aforesaid letter and acts, and also any further sums that may be found to be due the said State on any other account); and in making such settlement he shall retain the whole, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of said allowance or settlement, and apply the same to the payment of the principal and interest, or either, of said bonds of the State of Florida held as aforesaid, or to the reimbursement of the United States of moneys advanced by the United States on account of interest due on such bonds, and shall demand of said State, and allow to it, for the purpose of such settlement, the rate of interest stipulated in said bonds.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow said State to file such further evidence as the State may have to establish the right of the State to demand of the United States the payment of the items of said claim disallowed or suspended by the Secretary of War in the said report of the Judge-Advocate of the United States Army, and to include in such evidence all other payments made by said State for services, and to pay such sum so ascertained due the said State. And there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect immediately upon its passage.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In lines 18 and 19 of section 1 insert after the words "allow to it" the words "upon said claim or claims."

In line 8 of section 2 strike out the words "and to pay such sum so ascertained due the said State" and insert "and shall adjust and settle the claim of the State therefor and shall pay such sum as may be ascertained to be due the State thereon."

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I ask that the report of the committee be read as a part of my remarks.

The report (by Mr. DOUGHERTY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3877) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, beg leave to submit the following report:

In accordance with the requirements of the joint resolution of Congress approved March 3, 1881, the Secretary of War has investigated, audited, and made a report to Congress, May 22, 1882, of the amount due the State of Florida for expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities in that State between the 1st day of December, 1855, and the 1st day of January, 1860 (Ex. Doc. 203, Forty-seventh Congress, first session).

The expenditures grew out of the Seminole war of 1855, 1856, and 1857, the State authorities being compelled, in the presence of an anticipated and subsequently actual outbreak of the Indians, to call forth the militia of the State, the force of United States troops then on duty being inadequate to the protection of the people. The report of the Secretary of War (Ex. Doc. 203) fully sets forth in detail the items of expenditure allowed and disallowed, the total amount found due the State being the sum of $224,648.09.

It is established that the funds at the command of the executive of the State of Florida in the years referred to were insufficient to equip, supply, and pay the troops in the field, and relying upon the approval given by the President of the United States, through the Secretary of War, on the 21st day of May, 1857, of the services of these volunteers, the State Legislature, in order to provide their equipment and maintenance, authorized the issue of 7 per cent. bonds.

A portion of the bonds, amounting to $132,000, was sold by the governor to the Indian trust fund of the United States, and the proceeds of such sale were disbursed by the treasurer of the State for the "expenses of Indian hostilities," as appears from his report to the legislature for the year ending October 31, 1857 (Ex. Doc. 203, Forty-seventh Congress, first session). Another portion was hypothecated to the banks of South Carolina and Georgia as security for a loan of $222,015, and $192,331 of this loan was disbursed directly by a disbursing agent of the State in payment of "expenses of Indian hostilities," including pay of volunteers (Ex. Doc. 203, Forty-seventh Congress, first session).

This case is one where the Government, through the President of the United States by the Secretary of War, promised to pay these troops when mustered into the United States service, and they would have been long since paid by the Government if so mustered, but the mustering officer arrived in the State after they had been mustered out, and the State was compelled to borrow money with which to pay them (see letter of Secretary of War hereto appended).

Congress has universally paid interest to the States where they have paid interest. We cite the cases where interest has been allowed and paid for moneys advanced during the war of 1812-'15, as follows: Virginia, act March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. at L., p. 132); Maryland, act May 13, 1826 (4 Stat. at L., p. 161); Delaware, act May 20, 1826 (4 Stat. at L., p. 175); New York, act May 22, 1826 (4 Stat. at L., p. 192); Pennsylvania, act March 3, 1827 (4 Stat. at L., p. 241); South Carolina, act March 22, 1832 (4 Stat. at L., p. 499); Maine, act of March 31, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., p. 626); Massachusetts and Maine, act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. at L., p. 198).

For advances for Indian and other wars the same rule has been observed in the following cases: Alabama, act January 26 (4 Stat. at L., p. 344); Georgia, act March 31, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., p. 626); Georgia, act March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. at L., p. 385); Washington Territory, act March 3 1859 (11 Stat. at L., p. 429); New Hampshire, act January 27, 1852 (10 Stat. at L., p. 1); California, act of August 5, 1854 (10 Stat. at L., p. 582); California, act August 18, 1856 (11 Stat. at L., p. 91); California, act June 23, 1860 (12 Stat. at L., p. 104); California, act July 25, 1868 (15 Stat. at L., p. 175); California, act March 3, 1881 (21 Stat. at L., p. 510); and in aid of the Mexican war (see statute of June 2, 1848).

Attorney-General Wirt, in his opinion on an analagous case, says:

"The expenditure thus incurred forms a debt against the United States which they are bound to reimburse. If the expenditures made for such purposes are supplied from the treasury of the State, the United States reimburse the principal without interest; but if being unable itself, from the condition of its own finances, to meet the emergency, such State has been obliged to borrow money for the purpose, and thus to incur a debt on which she herself has had to pay interest, such debt is essentially a debt due by the United States, and both the principal and interest are to be paid by the United States (see Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 1, page 174)."

Thus it will be seen that the precedent for the payment of interest, under the rule adopted for the settlement of claims of war of 1812-'15, and Indian wars above cited, is well established.

The committee are of the opinion that the urgent necessity for the services of these troops, and the action of the President and the Secretary of War, are well established, and create an equitable obligation on the part of the General Government, and as it is clearly shown by Executive Document 203, Forty-seventh Congress, that the State of Florida not only borrowed money from the Indian trust fund, but also from the banks of the States of Georgia and South Carolina, for their payment, upon which the State has since paid interest, your committee have concluded to recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendments:

In line 18 of section 1, after the word "it," insert the words "upon said claim or claims."

In line 8 of section 2 strike out the words "and to pay such sum so ascertained due the said State," and insert the words, "and shall adjust and settle the claim of the State therefor, and shall pay such sum as may be ascertained to be due the State thereon."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., May 21, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, asking an approval of the services of certain volunteers called out by you, and in reply to inform you that the explanations as to the necessity of their services is satisfactory, and orders have been issued to the officer commanding in Florida to muster them in and out of the service of the United States.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD.
Secretary of War.

His excellency JAMES E. BROOME,
Governor of Florida.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I yield to my colleague [Mr. DAVIDSON].

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes from the Committee on Claims with a unanimous report in its favor. Its purpose is to effect a settlement between the United States and the State of Florida of claims held by each against the other. Having this object in view, I introduced in the House of Representatives of a former Congress a joint resolution, which is as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate, ascertain, and report to Congress, as soon as practicable, the amount of the claims of the State of Florida for expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities in that State between the 1st day of December, 1855, and the 1st day of January, 1860. In making such investigation the said Secretary is directed to receive and consider such testimony as he may deem necessary or proper for or against claims, including the muster-rolls of the State troops, and such other official data as may be on file in the War Department.

In submitting his report to Congress the said Secretary shall not include any payments or allowances made by the State in excess of the amounts allowed by law at the time in behalf of troops regularly in the service of the United States. (21 Stat., 520.)

This resolution was passed by Congress, and in accordance with its provisions the Secretary of War made the required investigation and report. From that report, which is found in Executive Document 203, first session Forty-seventh Congress, it appears that the United States Government is indebted to the State of Florida in the sum of $224,648.09 for expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities in that State during the years 1855, 1856, and 1857.

Florida claimed a larger amount, but the officers of the War Department in stating the account disallowed certain items because of missing vouchers, vouchers unreceipted, and lost muster-rolls. The Judge-Advocate-General of the United States deemed it best, as he states in his report, which is also found in this executive document, that these items "should be passed upon by the accounting officers of the Treasury under proper equitable rules provided by legislation in that behalf."

Mr. LONG. Is there any provision in the bill for the offset of the direct tax?

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. No, sir, not in the bill; but if it be necessary an amendment in regard to that matter may be offered. I do not think, however, any amendment is necessary.

Mr. LONG. Then this does not differ in that respect from the Georgia bill which is now pending.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that Florida owes only $33,000 of that war tax, $40,000 having been paid. This bill was drawn to cover that.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. One fact was ascertained beyond doubt by the investigation made by the Secretary of War—that the General Government is indebted to the State in the sum of at least $224,648.09 after disallowing certain items. And the General Government in addition to this amount is indebted to the State of Florida on account of the "five per centum" accruing under the act of Congress of March 3, 1845, entitled "An act supplementary to an act for the admission of Florida and Iowa into the Union, and for other purposes." (United States Statutes at Large, volume 5, page 788.) The amount due on that account, as appears in a statement furnished me by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was on the 30th day of June last $40,736.94. The communication is in these words:

Sir, the estimated amount due the State of Florida on the 30th of June last on account of the 5 per cent. accruing to her under act of March 3, 1845, is $40,736.94.

Moreover, the General Government owes the State of Florida under the provisions of the "swamp land indemnity" act, approved March 2, 1855, and entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands" (United States Statutes at Large, page 134). The exact amount of that indebtedness I have not with me.

As I have already stated, the object of the bill is to bring about a settlement between the United States and the State of Florida. The Treasurer of the United States holds for the Indian trust fund bonds of that State to the amount of $132,000. These bonds were issued in 1857, and draw interest at 7 per cent. per annum. The amount due to the Government on these bonds on the 1st day of January, 1886, was $221,200, principal and interest.

These bonds, as it appears from the report of the Committee on Claims, were sold by the governor of Florida to the Indian trust fund, and the proceeds of the sale were disbursed for "expenses of Indian hostilities," the very expenses which the State by this bill asks the United States to pay.

In a communication dated April 12, 1882, addressed by Hon. W. D. Bloxham, then governor of Florida, to Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, then Secretary of War (which can be seen in the report to which I have alluded, Executive Document 203), the following appears:

The payments of these expenses of Indian hostilities by the State were made in good faith, and upon full recognition and approval of the State authorities, and, I may add, with borrowed capital, upon which the State is now at this date paying interest.

I will also add that no portion of these disbursements has ever been reimbursed by the United States.

Also in the same report, under Abstract A, Exhibit No. 13, will be found a message from Hon. M. S. Perry, then governor of Florida, to the General Assembly of that State. It is dated, "Executive Department, Tallahassee, December 9," 1859, and the following is an abstract from it:

It has always been claimed, and I believe never denied, that the duty of suppressing Indian hostilities devolved upon the General Government, and that Government had long ago endeavored to effect their removal, and assumed the right to permit them to remain in the State, and withdrew the protection which the people had a right to expect. On the breaking out of hostilities the people on the frontier, for want of the protection which it was the duty of the Federal Government to give, found it necessary to embody themselves and perform the service which the exigencies of the times imposed upon them, and in doing so they had to abandon their usual occupations and suffer all the privations incident to an exposed frontier life. Under these circumstances the State felt it due to her own citizens to provide for their payment, relying on the justice of the General Government to refund to her the amount which she felt it her duty to pay.

The justice of such a demand can not rightfully be disputed, and it is hoped will at once be recognized. I therefore recommend that the General Assembly will, either by memorial or resolutions, or such other mode as they deem best, request of Congress the passing of a law refunding to the State the amount she has expended.

The loan made by the State to enable her to pay the just claims of her citizens falls due in April next, for the payment of which $346,000 of the bonds of the State have been hypothecated, by virtue of authority in me vested by the above-recited acts; and as the Federal Government may fail to refund in time the amount thus advanced by the State, I would recommend that the governor be authorized to sell, at their fair market value, so many of the bonds as may be found necessary to pay the loan at maturity, rather than permit them to be thrown upon the market at the option of the parties holding them, in the event of the payment not being otherwise provided for.

Mr. Chairman, the General Government owes this debt to the State of Florida. It is pledged to pay it, for the promise was virtually made by the President of the United States through the Secretary of War in 1856 and 1857. This will appear from the following correspondence then had by the Secretary of War with the governor of Florida:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 8, 1856.

SIR: Official accounts received from Florida indicate the renewal of the difficulties with the remnant of Indians residing in the southern portion of that peninsula.

To be prepared for such emergency—it being impracticable to send re-enforcements of regular troops—Bvt. Col. John Munroe, of the United States Army, who is charged with conducting the military operations in that quarter, has been authorized, should he deem their services necessary, to call on your excellency for an auxiliary volunteer force of five companies. Should Colonel Munroe avail himself of the discretionary authority thus conferred, I am instructed by the President to request that his requisition may be complied with, and to express the hope that the State authorities will give to the measure their cordial co-operation.

The volunteers will be received for six months, unless sooner discharged. Colonel Munroe will designate an officer of his command to muster the several companies at such time and place as you may appoint, and he will furnish any information that may be desired in respect to organization, pay, &c., of the volunteers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JEFFERSON DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

His excellency JAMES E. BROOME,
Governor of Florida, Tallahassee, Fla.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 21, 1856.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 31st ultimo in relation to the late outbreak of the Indians in Florida and offering any militia force that the Government may need to aid in quelling it.

In reply I have to inform you that previous to the receipt of your letter I addressed a communication to you requesting that five companies of volunteers might be called into the service of the United States. I have to refer you to that letter, dated the 8th instant, for the views of the Department in the matter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JEFFERSON DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

His excellency J. E. BROOME.
Governor of Florida, Tallahassee, Fla.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 21, 1857.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant asking an approval of the service of certain volunteers called out by you, and in reply to inform you that the explanation as to the necessity of their services is satisfactory, and orders have been issued to the officer commanding in Florida to muster them in and out of the service of the United States.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD,
Secretary of War.

His excellency J. E. BROOME,
Governor of Florida, Washington.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 28, 1857.

SIR: The President of the United States requests that, to aid in suppressing Indian hostilities within Florida, you cause to be detached, without delay, from the militia thereof, in accordance with a late suggestion of your own, not exceeding ten companies of mounted volunteers, to be reported by companies to the commanding officer of the United States troops engaged in that service, as fast as they can be detached, in order that the same may be duly mustered into the service and pay of the United States.

With the ten companies, a colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major, may be mustered; with eight, a lieutenant-colonel and major; and with six companies, only a lieutenant-colonel. In either case, one adjutant, one quartermaster, each with the rank of first lieutenant, and not exceeding three medical officers, may also be mustered into service.

A copy of this requisition will be sent to the commanding officer of the United States troops in Florida, with instructions to detach proper mustering officers to meet the volunteers at convenient points, and to correspond with you on that point and all others connected with the vigorous prosecution, on the part of the United States, of the said hostilities.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD,
Secretary of War.

His excellency J. E. BROOME,
Governor of Florida, Tallahassee.

From this correspondence it is evident that the United States Government needed the aid of Florida volunteers to quell the Indian outbreak in that State in 1855. The service was performed with the approval and in accordance with the request of the General Government, and the State of Florida paid for that service. The amount of expenses thus incurred has never been refunded. This bill provides for its payment—provides for a settlement between the United States and the State of Florida. The State is anxious to make a settlement—just such a settlement as honest men make with each other. It wants to pay what it owes, principal and interest, and asks the United States to do likewise.

As to the payment of interest by the United States Government, the precedents for it are numerous. In a report from the Committee on Claims of the Senate (Report No. 8, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), made January 6, 1886, I find more than fifty statutes cited, showing that Congress has allowed interest. In all of these cases the claimants were private individuals.

In an opinion of Attorney-General Wirt, found in "Opinions of the Attorneys-General," volume 1, page 724, he says:

The principle is this: the United States are bound by the relation which subsists between the General and State Governments to provide the means of carrying on war; and, as a part of the business of war, to provide for the defense of the several States. When the United States fail to make such provision, and the States have to defend themselves, by means of their own resources, the expenditure thus incurred forms a debt against the United States which they are bound to reimburse. If the expenditures made for such purpose are supplied from the treasury of the State, the United States reimburse the principal without interest; but if, being itself unable, from the condition of its own finances, to meet the emergency, such State has been obliged to borrow money for the purpose, and thus to incur a debt on which she herself has had to pay interest, such debt is essentially a debt due by the United States; and both the principal and interest are to be paid by the United States. So that, whenever a State has had to pay interest, by reason of her taking the place of the United States in time of war, such interest forms a just charge against the United States.

According to this rule interest has been paid to the following States for advances during the war of 1812–'15: Virginia (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 4, p. 132), Maryland (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 4, p. 161), Delaware (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 4, p. 175), New York (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 4, p. 192), Pennsylvania (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 4, p. 241), South Carolina (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 4, p. 499), Maine (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 9, p. 626), Massachusetts and Maine (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 16, p. 198). And in Indian and other wars the same rule has been observed in the following cases: Alabama (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 9, p. 344), Georgia (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 9, p. 626), Washington Territory (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 11, p. 429), New Hampshire (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 10, p. 1), California (U. S. Stats. at L., vol. 11, p. 91).

From the foregoing it will be seen that the precedent for the payment of interest is well established. Congress has invariably, I think, allowed interest to the States in cases where they paid interest. Of the cases cited none were more meritorious than the one now under consideration. Florida asks that the General Government shall do to her as it did to the States which have been mentioned. About the justice of her claim there can be no doubt. The money has been long due and the State needs it. Our Government, great and rich as it is, must not repudiate its debts, must not be dishonest.

I therefore earnestly hope that the bill will be passed.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the object of the bill is to settle up all outstanding accounts between Florida and the United States.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to inquire whether in this calculation you have taken into account $33,922 which the State of Florida owes the United States in direct taxes?

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I understand that an amendment will be offered to meet that.

Mr. LONG. Let me introduce an amendment to cover that.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], who has an amendment to offer on that subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], I desire to say that this bill was reported early from the Committee on Claims, and at a time when the war-tax matter was not as thoroughly understood by the committee as it is now. After the bill was reported to the House the attention of the committee was called to this matter, and there was an understanding among its members that an amendment should be offered covering the point to which the gentleman has already alluded, and to which, as I understand, the gentleman from Florida has no objection, but is willing to accept. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] has prepared such an amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to introduce it at this time.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend if this amendment, to which the gentleman from New Jersey has alluded, is heard and understood by the House, it would very much abridge the time to be taken up in the controversy on this bill. I send to the desk the amendment and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at the end of section 2 the following:
"And the Secretary of the Treasury shall offset against the amount hereby appropriated whatever balance may exist against said State of Florida on account of the direct war tax of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereto."

Mr. DAVIDSON. I accept that amendment as far as I have power to accept it.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the direct-tax question, to which this refers, does not properly belong to the settlement of this claim and should not be included in it.

Mr. SPRINGER. This provides a set-off for amounts due by the State of Florida to the General Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But this question of the direct tax, the war tax, relates to a number of States, and not exclusively to the State of Florida. When that bill is taken up which embraces the claims of all of the States, then it will be proper that a disposition be made of the subject, which will apply to all States alike, and not to the State of Florida alone, while it is left undisposed of as to all the other States.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. In reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, if the matter is to be settled as the gentleman proposes——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not think the direct tax is a debt due from the State at all, and for that reason it does not belong in this settlement. That is the point I had in view.

Mr. PRICE. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, that as I had the consent of the committee to offer that amendment I would have the privilege of making a brief explanation of its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. PRICE. I merely wish to state now that at the suggestion of some friends I shall ask consent to withdraw the amendment I have offered, for the reason that a member of the Committee on Claims has embodied the same idea in the shape of an amendment the language of which it is thought will more satisfactorily cover the point that I intended to embrace in my amendment. With the consent of the committee I will therefore withdraw the amendment and allow his to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The amendment which I shall now offer, that of the gentleman from Wisconsin having been withdrawn, is identical with that reported by the committee on other bills, and it avoids, in my judgment, the objection urged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]. The amendment is in the following words:

Add to section 2:
"Provided, That the balance remaining due of the direct tax, apportioned to the State of Florida by the direct-tax act of August 5, 1861, be held and treated as a proper set-off against the claims of the State of Florida in the adjustment herein required, unless Congress shall otherwise provide by general law, releasing all claims for said direct tax or refunding all payments of such tax heretofore made."

It will be seen that that leaves the matter remaining in abeyance in the United States Treasury until some general law regulating the whole question is passed, when Florida will come in under the operation of that general law, and be placed on an equality with every other State in the Union in that respect.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature in this bill to which I wish to ask the attention of the gentleman from Florida for a moment. I refer now to the first preamble which the bill recites in the following words:

Whereas under the joint resolution of Congress approved March 3, 1881, directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claim of the State of Florida against the United States for the suppression of Indian hostilities between the years 1855 and 1860, the said Secretary of War did investigate said claim, and ascertained the amount due to the said State to be $224,648.09, as returned to Congress in the letter of the Secretary of War, dated May 22, 1882, in Executive Document No. 203; and.

The bill then provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of the said State of Florida, as found and reported in said letter of the Secretary of War dated March 22, 1882, and under the acts above cited, and to pay to the said State such sums of money as he may find to be due. As to that item there is, as I understand it, nothing to be found. The Secretary of War did investigate the claim of the State, as the preamble already cited sets forth, and ascertained the amount due to the State to be $224,648.09. Now, as to that item the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to make that payment. There is to be no other inquiry as to the items composing that general result; but that is accepted as a basis as far as it goes. But nowhere in these papers does that letter of the Secretary of War appear; and I do not know upon what basis this rests.

But a large number of States, five or six, including my own, have the same question I apprehended that is presented here before the House. I apprehend the important item of this $224,000 grows out of the method of the adjustment of these former claims.

Now, if gentlemen will go to the trouble of looking into the subject they will find there has been legislation appropriating money during the period covered by the report; that up to the year 1859 there has been legislation appropriating moneys to these various purposes. Now, if my friend from Florida has anything which may throw light on the whole transaction I think he should submit it to the House.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Here is the letter which has been referred to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be read.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The committee has considered this letter; and all of the facts on which the committee have based the report are facts of documentary evidence and contained in this letter. I hold here in my hand the letter of the Secretary of War, containing all the information.

Mr. HOLMAN. When was it published?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. In the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not since then?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I knew it was a document not readily within our control. If that letter has been the basis of the large item of this claim it appears to me it should have been incorporated as a matter of convenience in the report, so that we should have had before us the basis on which the main item rests.

Mr. BURROWS. Let it be read.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I was about to read extracts from the letter. In my remarks a short time ago, after going through all the accounts——

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON] spoke from a remote point of the Hall, and down here we were not able to hear his remarks distinctly.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will read a part of the Judge-Advocate's report:

Amounts to be reported to Congress in the view taken by me of the provisions of the joint resolution of March 3, 1881, are as follows:
Abstract A, $154,623.66.

Then Abstract B is stated at so much; then Abstract C, Abstract D, Abstract E, Abstract F, Abstract G, Abstract H, Abstract I, Abstract K, and account of J. M. Cooper. All of these items appear in this executive document, making a total of $224,648.09.

An amount—

Says the Judge-Advocate—

less by $54,598.58, than that of the claim as submitted by the State.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not furnish any information as to what the claim is for. We have the acts of Congress before us showing the appropriations during these periods.

Mr. BURROWS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Florida that he have Exhibit A read.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Each one of these exhibits shows in detail what the money was expended for.

Mr. BURROWS. Have one of them read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Florida how much of this whole claim is interest.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The principal is $224,000. The whole amount the State of Florida will be likely to get under this bill will be $375,000.

Mr. LONG. After the deduction?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand it to be a sum which has been ascertained by the accounting department to be due, and that it embraces all that is found to be due.

Mr. DAVIDSON. That is the report made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is the date of the report?

Mr. DAVIDSON. The report was made soon after the resolution was passed by the Forty-seventh Congress; as soon as the directions of the resolution could be complied with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the committee understands this bill now sufficiently to rise and report it to the House.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. There are two verbal amendments to be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am sorry to take a different view from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. I do not think we have the data sufficiently before us yet.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state to the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state to the committee that the Committee on Claims had an understanding that the consideration of this bill was not to consume the hour, and if it should be indicated by the discussion that it would consume more than the hour, the committee would rise and the Committee on Claims would be permitted to call up another bill. Therefore as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires further to discuss this bill, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no; let us complete this bill. There was no agreement in the House, only a statement by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Good faith to the Committee on Claims requires that it should control this hour, and I hope gentlemen will not prevent that understanding from being carried out.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course an agreement on the part of the Committee on Claims does not bind the House. But the gentleman can test the matter by moving that the committee rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3877) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 5314) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to investigate private and domestic claims and demands other than war claims against the United States.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Before the House goes into committee, the Chair will state that he is advised that this bill is on the House Calendar and not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the House has just resolved itself into Committee of the Whole be reconsidered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to investigate and make a finding of fact in any claim or demand, other than war claims, against the United States, pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, upon the same being referred to the court under this act: Provided, That all claims and demands not finally presented to said court by the claimant or claimants within the period of two years after such claims and demands have been referred to the court under this act shall be forever barred.

SEC. 2. That the court is required to promptly consider all claims and demands referred under this act and presented to the court, under such needful rules and regulations as it may adopt, and subject to the provisions of existing laws not inconsistent with this act. That on the first day of every December session of Congress the clerk of the Court of Claims shall transmit to each House of Congress a full and complete statement of the findings of fact in each claim or demand investigated under this act and not theretofore reported, stating what amount, if anything, is due the claimant or claimants; whether the claim or demand is founded upon any act of Congress, or upon any contract, express or implied; the laches or diligence of the claimant or claimants in presenting the claim or demand against the United States; and such other findings of fact and conclusions of law as the court shall deem material to enable Congress to pass upon such claim or demand. That until such claim or demand is finally investigated and reported upon to Congress by the court as herein provided, neither House of Congress shall consider the same, by bill or otherwise, in reference to allowing any such claim or demand.

SEC. 3. That whenever any private or domestic claim or demand, other than war claims, against the United States is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall there be proceeded with as herein provided. When claims and demands are referred to the court under this act, by any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, such committee shall, before the end of the session of Congress at which such reference was made, report the fact in writing to the House of Congress by which such committee was appointed. That nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claim or demand, and that no judgment shall be entered thereon by the court.

SEC. 4. That at the adjournment of each Congress, all bills relating to private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States, which may be pending in either House of Congress or before any committee of either House, shall, by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House respectively, be referred to the Court of Claims, together with all papers relating thereto, as hereinbefore provided; and all such claims and demands shall be investigated by the court as provided in this act. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House shall enter in the Journals of the respective Houses, and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a statement showing what bills have been so transferred.

SEC. 5. That after the passage of this act neither House of Congress shall consider or entertain, for any purpose other than that of referring the same to some judicial tribunal or commission under existing law, any private or domestic claim or demand against the United States which involves the investigation of facts, other than war claims, until such facts shall have been investigated by such judicial tribunal or commission and the findings of fact reported to Congress.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, to appear for the defense and protection of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act.

SEC. 7. That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, as we have but two minutes to-day in which to consider this bill, and as it must go over until to-morrow, I will simply now ask members to give the subject such attention as they can in the interval. The report upon the bill was printed in full in the RECORD of February 17, and can also be found in the document-room. That report explains the provisions of the bill in full. To-morrow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] will address the House on the subject, and I ask members to have the report before them at that time so that they may intelligently consider the measure. Its object is briefly this, to provide that hereafter, before this House will consider claims against the United States other than war claims, the facts shall be ascertained by the Court of Claims.

Mr. TUCKER. It is like the Bowman act.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is substantially the same, except that the Bowman act included war claims and also contained a provision which excluded everything that was barred by the statute of limitations, so that the act practically amounted to nothing. The reason we have excluded war claims from the provisions of this bill is that our committee has no jurisdiction of such claims. The bill as reported relates only to subjects of which the Committee on Claims has jurisdiction. Its object is to remove from the consideration of Congress the great mass of these private claims.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give the gentleman notice that when this bill comes up to-morrow I shall move an amendment striking out the words "other than war claims."

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a single remark before the debate closes. I reported from the Committee on the Judiciary today a bill which covers this whole question. It gives jurisdiction to the Court of Claims and to the district and circuit courts of the United States to try suits upon all claims brought against the United States at law or in equity.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have unanimous consent that all these bills on this subject be considered together to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864; and

A bill (H. R. 5219) to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of the city of New York.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the desire of several gentlemen upon the floor, I ask unanimous consent that the bill reported by me this morning from the Committee on the Judiciary, to authorize suits against the United States, be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning for the information of members.

Mr. MORRISON. I am compelled to object, Mr. Speaker. I have denied the same privilege to other gentlemen.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES BILL.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4.

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 2, 6, and 7.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 1, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"To reimburse the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department of the Army for the expenses attending the funeral of General Grant, paid by authority of the executive order directing General Hancock to give General Grant an imposing funeral, $12,037.93.

To pay the three items of expense referred by General Hancock to the Secretary of War, namely, for hire of stenographer, $195; telegrams received and sent, $452.83; mileage expenses, $353.68; in all, $1,001.51, or so much thereof as the Secretary of War may find to be due and unpaid.

To pay the bill of Stephen Merritt, undertaker, for embalming, burial casket and ornamentation thereof, canopy, catafalque, and other necessary articles and services furnished by him at reasonable prices, and which remain unpaid, $6,303.75, or so much thereof as may be necessary and found upon examination by the Secretary of War to be just and proper charges.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 5, with an amendment, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

"WATER SUPPLY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

"The sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of War to preserve from flooding or other injury, during the suspension of operations thereon, the tunnel now being constructed under authority of an act to increase the water supply of Washington city, and for other purposes, approved July 15, 1882, the said sum to be subject to all the provisions and restrictions of said act and of the act approved July 15, 1884, making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, as to its apportionment and settlement between the United States and the District of Columbia and the refunding thereof."

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I promised the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] in charge of the Indian appropriation bill that I would move the previous question on this report in ten minutes. A brief explanation therefore is all that can be expected on this occasion.

The report just read recommends concurrence in the Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4. These two amendments are practically but one amendment. They have relation simply to the transfer by the Postmaster-General of a portion of the gas fund for the Post-Office Department to the fund for supplying gas in the Money-Order and Sixth Auditor's Office to the amount of $250. This is regarded as necessary, and necessary immediately. It has relation to appropriations of the current year, of course.

The report recommends non-concurrence in Senate amendments numbered 2, 6, and 7. Amendment No. 2, in which the committee recommend non-concurrence, proposes to authorize and enable the Secretary of War to lay a new submarine cable between the Rhode Island coast and Block Island, a distance of about 12 miles, at a cost of $18,350. This is not a deficiency. It is a new and original enterprise—an original undertaking—a new work. It is in no sense a deficiency. It should go to some other committee.

It is not, so far as the Committee on Appropriations could ascertain, a continuation of any work now in progress, nor is it for the repair of any work authorized by existing law. This, perhaps, is about all that need be said now in regard to this item. As to the merits of the proposition, something might be said, and doubtless will be said hereafter.

I think it proper to add that if there is any urgency in this item of appropriation it is not an urgency that affects the interests of the Government; it is not an urgency in behalf of the public service in any Department of the Government, but may be an urgency on the part of the boarding-house keepers on Block Island, a letter from one of whom is transmitted with the estimate.

Amendment No. 6 appropriates $260 for the repair of the water-tank on the main building of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum in Washington. We recommend non-concurrence in this item, for the reason that we have been unable to find any necessity for the appropriation. Doubtless by the further action of the Senate or in conference we may learn that there is some necessity for it; but as at present advised we have not felt authorized to recommend concurrence.

Amendment No. 7 is an appropriation of $5,000 for miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, for the use of the Senate. These miscellaneous items have not been designated in any manner to us. Why the "labor" should be "excluded" is probably owing to the fact that my distinguished colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] is a member of the wrong House, or this deficiency may be the result of the action of the Senate in giving each Senator a secretary at the public expense. If so, the House may wish to know it even if it should speak—

In a bondman's key,
With 'bated breath and whisp'ring humbleness.

As at present advised—or unadvised, rather—we have been constrained to recommend non-concurrence in this item.

A brief explanation of the action of the Committee on Appropriations with regard to Senate amendment No. 1 is no doubt desired by the House, and I am authorized to make it. It is an item appropriating $30,000 to pay the expenses attending the imposing pageantry in New York on the 8th of August last, when the mortal remains of ex-President Grant were finally interred. Having, in constant devotion to the cardinal principles of my party, earnestly opposed the election of this great and successful soldier to the Presidency in his two memorable contests of 1868 and 1872, I would have surrendered the duty now devolved upon me to one of my esteemed Republican colleagues but for the fact that a conclusion was reached in committee, after much consideration, which was entirely satisfactory, as I understand it, to the representatives thereon of both sides of the House.

In justice to several distinguished gentlemen on this floor, who, when this bill was first discussed in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, emphasized their determination to oppose all appropriations proposed to be made to pay liabilities incurred without lawful authority, it ought to be stated that no particular statute has been found authorizing expenses of this character to be incurred; or, being incurred, to be paid. There are precedents—many precedents—and they appear to have been sustained by public opinion, or rather forbearance, until but few, it seems, care to look for authority in either the Constitution or the laws.

General Hancock was directed to take charge of the public ceremonies and give the distinguished dead an imposing funeral at the public expense. He was also instructed to report such expenses, and, as far as possible, to classify them under proper heads of appropriations for the support of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army. As our report agrees to the Senate amendment with an amendment of our own, it must be stated that while we have reduced the amount from $30,000, as proposed by the Senate, to $19,343.19 as amended by us, we have made a full and complete appropriation for every legitimate or possibly legitimate expense.

General Hancock, who alone was empowered to contract or incur expenses, and who was charged with the duty of approving the bills therefor, reported and approved bills aggregating $12,037.93. Some other items, about which General Hancock must have had some doubt because he did not approve them, but which he reported as possibly entitled to payment, amount to $1,001.51. The first-mentioned amount was paid out of the funds of the Quartermaster's Department; the latter amount has not been paid. The proposed amendment of the House reimburses the Quartermaster's Department and appropriates the $1,001.51.

These were all the items that General Hancock approved or recommended directly or indirectly for payment or that were paid by him. But the undertakers—Merritt & Son—after having received $7,860 for items in two bills rendered to General Hancock, bring in a third bill for $6,303.75, which was not approved by General Hancock because the items were contracted or furnished—if they were furnished—prior to the order directing General Hancock to take charge of the arrangements. For this third bill, however, we appropriate because of its supposed relation to the honored subject of that mournful occasion. The Secretary of War is directed, as the best protection we can interpose, to examine the items of this third bill with reference to the reasonableness of the charges and the receipt of the articles charged.

Thus it will be seen we appropriate: To reimburse the Quartermaster's Department, $12,037.93; to pay items of expense about which General Hancock had doubt, $1,001.51; and to pay Merritt & Son's third bill, $6,303.75, making a total, as before stated, of $19,343.19.

The remaining items involved in the Senate amendment—and which we have been unable to approve—amount to $10,656.81. They are claims made to refund to the militia organizations of New York amounts alleged to have been paid to their own militia bands of music for their services and music according to union rates. The attempt to get them allowed against the Government was evidently the result of an afterthought. Militia General Shaler's communication shows the fact. They were not approved or authorized as expenditures by General Hancock. There was no authority in law or in fact for them as charges against the United States. We can not allow these bills in favor of the militia regiment of New York attending upon that occasion with their bands of music or their drum corps without making similar allowances in favor of our friends who came from Massachusetts, from New Jersey, from Philadelphia, from Chicago, and elsewhere all over this broad land, and incurred similar expenses.

The military establishment of the State of Massachusetts, as I am informed, expended over $10,000 in sending militia and bands of music to participate in these ceremonies, yet Massachusetts has asked no compensation or return. I understand that the great city of Chicago, represented on that occasion in a like manner, has declined to present any bill. I was not quite accurate in saying that the whole of this $10,656.81 was for the militia of New York. Let me be accurate now. For the band of the "Old Guard," of New York city, $217 are claimed; for Seventh Militia, $964; for Eighth Militia, $730; for Ninth Militia, $1,010; for Eleventh Militia, $514; for Twelfth Militia, $613; for Twenty-second Militia $1,004; for Sixty-ninth Militia, $516; for Seventy-first Militia, $892; for horses, saddles, and bridles for First Militia Battery, $509; for Second Militia Battery, $683; for thirty-five saddle-horses for militia, $350—$10 each per day!—making a militia total of $8,002, to say nothing of militia sashes, quarters, clerks, stenographers, &c., for nearly all the remainder of the amount disallowed. New York has had a good deal to do about General Grant, his funeral, and his place of interment. It is not seemly that we should be asked to pay her citizens for attending the last ceremonies in honor of this illustrious soldier.

But in justice to that great Commonwealth it should be stated that this latest attempt to take money from the Treasury not properly owing to any one is not New York's. Neither the city nor the State is in any respect responsible for this industrious and energetic effort. It may be charged alone to a somewhat noted militia general of that State, who appears to have conceived the idea of making the United States pay the militia bills alluded to. Unless the general is a claim agent, he is a very benevolent and generous militiaman. The letter which I now send to the Clerk's desk will throw much light upon the question of animus with regard to the getting up of these claims. The Clerk will please read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION N. G. S. N. Y.,
New York, August 11, 1885.

I am directed by Major-General Shaler to ask you to send in your bill for music on the occasion of the obsequies of General Grant, it being his intention to make an effort to relieve you of the expense. Please send the bills in triplicate, receipted, itemizing the number of band musicians, drum corps, the drum-major, and band leader, with the rate of compensation for each, according to the scale of prices established by the Mutual Musical Protective Union, and include both parades.

Very respectfully,

CARL JUSSEN, Col. and A. A. A. Gen'l.

Mr. BURNES. Let the Clerk read what is written on the margin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sent to each brigade commander and to each regimental commander direct.

Mr. BURNES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have simply to say that I have no word of denunciation for the author of that letter. It seems in his anxiety to please the militia of New York he voluntarily reminded them that the United States owes them something; a fact which probably they never otherwise would have thought of. I am proud in the belief that the militia of New York would never have sent in any such bills but for the influence of that letter, which they must have regarded as an order from their brigade commander. This amendment of the Senate included all these items, covering the militia claims, and we desire to go into conference unless the Senate recedes.

It is known to the House generally that a tunnel is being constructed in connection with the water-works. Some complication has arisen in regard to it, but it has become necessary pending this complication to pump out the water to preserve the work which has been already done. Hence we have put in an amendment on the part of the committee to appropriate $5,000 for that purpose in order to prevent the work done going to destruction.

Now, having given this brief explanation, I feel obliged to redeem my promise to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to call for the previous question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand the proposition is to non-concur in the amendment relating to the Block Island cable. I understand the Secretary of War has recommended it as important to the coast commerce of the country this cable should be repaired at once.

Mr. BURNES. I will say to my friend from Ohio that if I had time to explain this whole matter fully he would admit beyond all doubt there is at least no urgent necessity for it. I say now in the presence of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], one of my colleagues on the committee, that we had an interview with a representative of the War Department, who conceded there was no urgent necessity for it, and that if completed in September or October it would be in ample time for the winter's storms. If it be a meritorious proposition and a deficiency, we can put it in the general deficiency bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask, for information, whether the $30,000 added by the Senate was included, as I understand, in the estimate of the Secretary of War?

Mr. BURNES. Yes; the Senate acted on the estimate of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The Secretary of War submitted the whole estimate?

Mr. BURNES. Yes; the Department submitted an estimate of that sort.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The Department submitted the estimate for the whole $30,000.

Mr. BURNES. The Department estimated for the $30,000; but, I presume, without a complete examination of all the evidence we have been compelled to examine or consider.

Mr. SPOONER. Before the gentleman from Missouri calls for the previous question, I hope he will give me opportunity to say something about the Block Island cable.

Mr. BURNES. As a condition precedent to my getting the floor I had to pledge the gentleman from Texas to move the previous question in ten minutes; but as the constituents of my friend from Rhode Island are interested in this item, I think it will meet the approbation of the Speaker if I yield to the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. SPOONER. It is hardly fair to make statements, as the gentleman has done in reference to this Block Island cable, without giving some opportunity for reply. The gentleman is mistaken in the fact he has suggested, which I would like to call to the attention of the House.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPOONER. Ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that will be granted to him.

Mr. BURNES. Very well; that is all right. The gentleman asked for ten minutes, and it was granted.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has stated that the Senate amendment providing for a submarine cable in Block Island Bay was for an original work, and not for something existing under the law at the present time.

I would say, in reply to that, that the gentleman is certainly very much mistaken. The telegraphic cable was first laid in Block Island Bay, connecting the mainland with the island, as a part of the Signal Service telegraph system. That cable was a very light one, and consequently insufficient to sustain the violence of the storms that beat around that coast; and after frequent repairs it finally, in October last, in a great storm, was swept away entirely. The object which the Senate amendment has in view is to replace that cable.

It is in the direction of repairing that part of the telegraphic line affording communication between the mainland and the island, and whatever the gentleman may believe concerning the matter in connection with that cable, it is a work of public importance and necessity; and I submit to him that he has been very seriously mistaken when he undertakes to claim that it is for private benefit only, and not for public advantage.

When that cable was first laid it was at the suggestion not only of people in my own State and locality, but upon representations made by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and upon the recommendation of a number of marine insurance companies in New York and Boston and other localities, as well as upon the urgent request of the large ship-owners from New England and New York and along down the southern coast. This locality is one of great danger upon our coast.

We have upon Block Island two life-saving stations and two light-houses. The island is 10 miles at sea from its nearest point to the mainland. The signal service there has been a most important part of that branch of our service. The signals are visible from all the surrounding waters, and have been guides to the commerce which passes in that locality to a greater extent, I am prepared to say, than upon any other part of our entire coast. It is at the entrance not only of Narragansett Bay, but also of Long Island Sound. A great amount of foreign and domestic shipping of all kinds passes in that vicinity. The storm signals there are important to our commerce, both that passing in and out of Long Island Sound and of Narragansett Bay, and also that passing to and from Boston and northern and southern portions of our coast.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. May I interrupt the gentleman from Rhode Island to ask a question? I understood from my colleague on the committee [Mr. BURNES] that in a conference with some officials of the Signal Service he was informed that it would be in time if the appropriation for the repair of this cable was made by the 1st of October. Let me ask what is the condition of that coast between now and that time which would render a delay a matter of any serious moment?

Mr. BURNES. I would like to suggest to my friend from Rhode Island to let us dispose of this matter at once, and I will pledge my earnest, faithful consideration of the subject in the committee when we come to the consideration of the deficiency bill. We will hear him upon this question, and I pledge him now in the presence of my colleague [Mr. McComas] on the committee, who was present when the interview to which I have heretofore referred took place, and I know he would not suspect me of giving a partisan coloring to the matter, that the representative of the Signal Service was before us for two hours or more and we made a most careful and thorough investigation of the subject. He only claims that the cable was necessary for operation during the storms of winter, so far as any of the services of that department are concerned. So far as the summer season is concerned, of course the necessities of the case are not so great.

But, I repeat, I pledge my friend from Rhode Island that we will consider the matter in due time, and that he shall have a hearing before the committee; and that as the time is now pressing, and other bills are waiting for consideration, and my friend from Texas is looking at me as if with daggers in his eyes, I beg that he will allow this matter to go to the Senate without delay.

Mr. SPOONER. As I said to the gentleman from Missouri in a conversation with reference to this subject only the other day, I have no desire to press it upon the House except as a matter of legitimate business and commercial necessity. When the gentleman from Missouri, however, speaks of the necessities of the "boarding-houses upon Block Island," as he is pleased to call them, he is as much mistaken as in reference to any other suggestion concerning this matter which has been improperly made.

It is no disadvantage to the Government certainly, and its service that a revenue is obtained every year, as it is obtained, from the use of this Government cable by private parties.

Mr. BURNES. Two hundred and fifty dollars a year to the Treasury.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have a statement here from the officer in charge of that station at Block Island. This relates to the year 1885, commencing with January of the year and ending on the 13th of October, when the cable was swept away, covering a period of only about nine months of the year. The receipts at Block Island in that year were not $250, but were $693.87, of which he says:

If you wish to know the amount of money including other lines, multiply the results given each year by 2, and the aggregate will be approximately correct as showing the total receipts.

Which, as I understand him, means that the $693.87 received, as I have said, are the receipts at the Block Island end of the line; but that there was a corresponding amount paid for the service at the mainland for telegrams to Block Island, making an aggregate of nearly $1,400 instead of $250, as the gentleman states, and that was for only about nine months in the year 1885.

It certainly is no disadvantage to the Government that upon this appropriation now asked for it receives more than 7½ per cent. upon that investment in the term of nine months from private business running over that line, an amount which may be fairly said to be at the rate of 10 per cent. for the twelve months of that year. The gentleman says this is not a deficiency appropriation——

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed to the gentleman from Rhode Island have expired.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not understand that I was limited to ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to yield ten minutes.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the gentleman to say ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURNES. In reality I said two and a half minutes, but the Chair understood me to say ten.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to say a word. It is not necessary at this time to discuss the merits of a submarine cable from Block Island to the mainland. If the Committee on Appropriations under the rules have authority at any time to insert that proposition in any of the bills of which they have control it would naturally go into the sundry civil bill. This is confessedly not urgent. Moreover, in my judgment it is not a deficiency at all, and has therefore, under any guise in which it may be presented, no place in this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I insist this is an urgent deficiency for the reason I was about to state.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not a deficiency. It is a proposition to lay a new submarine cable.

Mr. SPOONER. The Secretary of the Treasury of the present administration reports it as a deficiency.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I am as good a judge of that as he is.

Mr. SPOONER. Possibly; but I accept the official statement of the Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Burnes] demands the previous question.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the previous question will not be ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope it will be.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that in the judgment of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. SPOONER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 37.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Unless separate votes are demanded on the various amendments, the Chair will put the question on agreeing to the report made by the committee.

Separate votes were not demanded.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. Townshend in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. RYAN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Cutcheon].

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire during the ten minutes that the gentleman from Kansas has courteously yielded to me to further discuss in detail to some extent, some objections which have been made, and especially by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon], whom at this moment I do not see in his seat, which I regret, because I desire his attention to what I am about to say as well as the attention of the rest of the committee.

The gentleman from Illinois, in debating this bill and while on the subject of Indian education, used the following language:

I admit that at Carlisle and other schools, which have been referred to, the children while in the schools make magnificent progress in education; but I do say that without exception, when they return to the tribes where they must live, if the sustaining influence of the Government is withdrawn, they drop back at once into the savage condition; they are compelled to succumb to the sentiments of the tribe, the evil influences of which they absorb, instead of retaining the good that they have received at Carlisle or elsewhere; so that their condition is worse than if they had never been taken from the reservation.

And again the gentleman from Illinois used the following language:

In company with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Ryan], with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Peel], and with my friend from Indiana [Mr. Holman], I traveled through the Indian country; we made diligent inquiry across the continent to the north and across the continent to the south, and we could not find that there was one student of all the hundreds educated at Carlisle or Hampton, or in any of the schools off the reservations, but had gone back to their savage life in a very short time except a few that were employed by the Government of the United States.

In another place he uses the expression that they had gone back "to the blanket." The other day when we were discussing this bill I did not have in my possession the data, which I knew to exist, from which understandingly and authoritatively to discuss this question. I now hold in my hand a little pamphlet issued by the Hampton school, containing the results of an investigation by what I will call a commission sent out by that school last summer and fall for the express purpose of investigating and reporting upon the results and effects of the education which the Indian girls and boys had received at Hampton. And I might say, in passing, this pamphlet itself is an illustration of what the Indian and negro boys educated there can do, for it is printed in the school's printing office, and is entirely printed by the boys and girls of these two races, the Indians and the negroes.

The first article of this pamphlet, the title of which is "Hampton Institute; its work for two races," bears the signature of M. F. A. I take that to be a lady connected with the institute. This, at all events, is issued by the authority of the school. The first statement to which I desire to call the attention of the committee at the present time is the following:

Of the one hundred and forty-five Indians who have returned after three years here to their homes two-thirds are doing well as teachers, farmers, mechanics, laborers, &c., while not one has become a renegade, their great difficulty being the want of steady employment.

This report was made last November.

Mr. STORM. By what school?

Mr. CUTCHEON. It is issued by the Hampton Institute, and is entitled "The Hampton Institute; its work for two races."

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a remark just there?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know the gentleman who issued that pamphlet, but I am of opinion that he is the gentleman who gathers up these children, and one of that army of office-holders who will always oppose reforms upon the Indian bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, as I have but a few minutes, I desire to proceed as rapidly as I can. The next article in this pamphlet is by a well-known lady, Miss Helen W. Ludlow. Miss Ludlow was detailed last autumn to go among the Sioux, and investigate at the agencies on the several reservations, expressly and specifically, the condition of the Hampton boys and girls.

This is her testimony:

HAMPTON'S INDIAN STUDENTS AT HOME.

BY HELEN W. LUDLOW.

In this practical age every cause that appeals to the people must be put to the most practical of tests. So, therefore, must the cause of Indian education.

First, there is the school test. Will Indians study? Can they learn? Hampton answers with her hundred and forty Indian students, acquiring all the branches of elementary education through the medium of a language itself the most difficult of their studies; with her thirty Indian members of the normal school keeping up with their English-speaking comrades in all its classes; with her nine Indian graduates who have completed the full normal course, one of them contemplating a professional education.

Then there is the industrial test. Will Indians work? Can they be broken into civilized pursuits?

Hampton answers with her farms and work-rooms and training-shops, where Indian apprentices are working under white masters and side by side with a race long trained to labor, as farmers, carpenters, harness-makers, blacksmiths, tinsmiths, shoemakers, printers, tailors, seamstresses, house-workers, producing results that stand the most impartial and inexorable of all tests, that of the market.

Thousands of visitors from every section of the country and from abroad have for the last six years seen the application of these tests of the school and industrial training in Indian education at Hampton. They are virtually, perhaps, no longer in question among intelligent people.

There remains the home test—most practical, most important, crucial. Will the Indians stay civilized? Or is it true, as a Western paper feelingly puts it, that "the Indian boys and girls in our various institutions of learning show themselves to be apt scholars, but the experience is that as soon as they are returned to their tribe they don the blanket and return to the customs of their fathers and mothers."

Is this the "experience?" Hampton has no wish to work for a cause whose failure is a foregone conclusion; no right to ask for help in such a work.

To study this and the general Indian question on the ground that the school itself and the friends of the red man might better know the actual facts about him I was sent out last July, and spent the summer in the West, visiting especially the Sioux reservations in Dakota, from which most of our Indian students come, and where over a hundred of them, returned to their homes within the last five years, are now living. There, if anywhere, the answer should be found. And, when it is found, should it not be acted upon?

In my exceedingly interesting journey, which I wish could be as easily taken as the trip to Hampton by all who are honestly interested in the question, I visited five agencies along the Missouri River in Dakota and one in Wisconsin, where were living seventy-three returned Indian students—twenty-seven young women and girls, forty-six young men and boys, who had been returned to their homes from Hampton at different times, from one to five years ago. Forty-five of these I saw myself, talking with them freely, and visiting most of their homes. Of all, I had separate and full accounts from their agents, missionaries, teachers, employers, and acquaintances. The agencies I visited were Yankton, Lower Brule, Crow Creek, Standing Rock, and Fort Berthold in Dakota—staying four to ten days at each, and two days at the Menomonee reservation in Wisconsin.

This is the record, good and bad:

Of the seventy-three, four and only four, "don the blanket." One of these is an epileptic girl, another a consumptive boy who was only a few months at Hampton, and in his weakness finds his accustomed dress the easiest—wearing his blanket as a white invalid would his dressing gown. The other two are young women who, though not considered good material at Hampton, ought to know better, but have married in Indian style and gone back to Indian life.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrrupt him there?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know this lady——

Mr. CUTCHEON. She is a teacher at Hampton.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how many of these Indians, of whom she speaks, are employed by the Government, nor does she tell us; but as against her statements I submit, not ex parte statements, made not under the obligation of an oath, nor the statement of a party in interest, but the concurrent testimony, taken under oath, of witnesses at the agencies that these Indians, without exception, unless where they have been employed by the Government, have relapsed into barbarism.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed. Miss Ludlow further says:

Four others are reported as "bad," have done nothing criminal, and keep themselves in citizen's dress, but are "lazy and troublesome," their influence and example on the wrong side. Nineteen more have not had a continuously good record, but are doing fairly well now. One of them went back to his blanket for a time, but the influences of the new life were not wholly lost and have started him again in the white man's road, as great a witness to their power perhaps as could be given.

Forty-six have done very well indeed—some of them very remarkably so—constantly since their return working as they had opportunity; the boys at their trades, farming, or other manual labor, clerking or teaching; the girls as teachers or assistants in the schools, helping their parents or keeping house for themselves, five having married since their return home.

Forty-six out of seventy-three—would it be a bad proportion for the honor-roll of any white "institution of learning?" And to these may fairly be added six, who, after spending one or more years at home with a good record, returned to school at their own desire, and were doing well there when I was at their homes. Three of the forty-six have since followed their example.

Of the fifteen who have died at their homes, the only one who even partially returned to Indian garments did so because he was too weak to work for others, but pathetically begged to be buried like a white man in the citizen's clothes sent him by a kind friend. One young man yielded to the temptations of a military camp and died in consequence; two others did not do continuously well. The rest did all as well as they had physical strength and opportunity, two of them very finely.

I have not included in these figures the agency of Cheyenne River, because I stopped there but a few hours, and obtained only a general instead of a detailed report. It was that "the Hampton students are doing generally well. None have returned to camp life."

Twenty-eight girls and boys sent home in July to various agencies are also not included. Twenty-one of these I saw myself, or were reported to me as having gone to work and promising well.

I pass now to what this lady says about the Indians at Lower Brule:

AT LOWER BRULE.

We shall see what a Hampton Indian girl can be in her parent's home—a home of the better class: helpful, cheerful, the main stay and quiet influence for good. We shall see, too, what a Hampton returned student can do for his Indian father—an old chief, stubbornly opposed to progress—when he takes a manly stand for right; shake his prejudices and change his heart to work for education instead of against it. We shall find one of the Hampton Indian families, father, mother, and baby boy, soon to move into the house built for them by the father who learned his trade at Hampton, and helped build his cottage there.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. RYAN. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I read further from this lady's testimony:

Among the twenty-two returned students, six girls and sixteen boys, we shall find alas, the four reported "bad and troublesome," and two of those who have "returned to the blanket"—of whom there were four out of seventy-three, you will remember. Of the rest, two are "doing fairly well;" twelve have done very well since their return, working, two as teachers, the rest as farmers, or attending school or helping at home. The young men who have just returned are also at work. One of them will return to the East to study for the ministry.

At Crow Creek we find all of the Hampton boys at work, under the fostering care of Agent Gasmann: a teacher, a carpenter, blacksmiths, farmers, a policeman—ten or a dozen, counting the newly arrived, who do not mean to be behind the rest and are greatly encouraged at finding work all ready for them. Of the ten young women and girls—four of them new-comers—two are wives who returned with their husbands. One, married in Indian fashion, completes the list of the four returned to the blanket; the rest are doing well; three of them are in delicate health. If we call at the two-story house of Chief Wizi we shall find that he has kept the best room in it for his granddaughter, our little Amy. It is what we should expect of this Christian chief, who, when his grandson died at Hampton years ago, called his people together and told them: "If only one of our children returns to teach us the white man's road it would be worth the loss of all the rest."

At Standing Rock let us first join our rejoicings with his four thousand Indians over the reappointment of their good "father" Agent McLaughlin for another four years. It means to them a new lease of life and hope and progress; to us, some faith that public sentiment, and its servant the Government, are growing wise enough to recognize first-rate work, and leave it unspoiled by partisan politics.

We hear only good reports from our sixteen Hampton boys and girls; even the three who seemed for a time on the wrong track are doing well; two of them are married and settled. None have ever gone back to the blanket, and none have died.

Among the many signs of progress on this most interesting agency, perhaps it was natural that to me one of the most interesting was a little white school-house on the edge of the camp of the late "hostiles," part of Sitting Bull's band; a little white school-house with a belfry, and in the doorway two Hampton girls standing to greet their unexpected guests: Rosa, the graceful, dignified young teacher, and Frances, the smiling housekeeper, proud to show their pretty school-room and their tidy little menage. I did not wonder at all to hear that a Congressman prominent in Indian legislation was surprised by that sight of the results of Eastern education into the expression of his admiring conviction, "Well, this solves the Indian problem!"

Perhaps one of my distinguished friends here is the very Congressman here referred to.

Given such trained teachers in such a school-house to every thirty Indian children on the reservations, and how long will the solution take?

Another Hampton girl is her husband's assistant teacher in a school for eighty on a remote part of the reservation between two farming settlements, one of them from Sitting Bull's band, scattered out on their separate farms under the agent's wise encouragement.

Of the young men, one has married a daughter of old Sitting Bull, but instead of living on his rich father-in-law, as he might, supports his wife by his carpenter's trade learned at Hampton. Another, with his wife and fine little boy, lives at the agency in charge of the Government stables, is accumulating stock of his own, and doing well in every way. Two are blacksmiths, two herders; one little fellow of fourteen, whom we hated to part with at Hampton, we find putting up his cows for the night. He takes care of his mother's farm with his hired man, and is the head of the family. The new-comers all went to work at once in the harvest-field. Four from this agency have voluntarily gone to Hampton a second time for a further course of training. The desire for education is so wide awake and eager on this reservation that the pressure of applicants for Hampton was greater than could be responded to this fall. It would have been easy to bring on thirty or more at once.

Now, I submit that the statements which I have read from the report of this lady who went upon these reservations, who visited the agencies, saw these boys and girls and talked with them, are not in harmony with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that he could not find a single one of all the students of these schools that had not gone back to the blanket. There is a discrepancy.

Mr. CANNON. I am sure the gentleman does not desire to do me an injustice.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly not.

Mr. CANNON. Yet his remarks have that effect when he makes me occupy the broad position that he has just stated.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I read the gentleman's remarks at the beginning, so that I had my text.

Mr. CANNON. I did not happen to be here when the gentleman read my remarks; but my statement was (as my remarks must have shown, if the gentleman read the whole of them) that we failed to find a single one of all these students that had not gone back to the blanket or barbarism, except where the Government gave them employment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. "Except a few" is the gentleman's language.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman in his remarks just now appeared to ignore the exception I had made.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The exception seems to take in pretty nearly all except four.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman if he had inquired would have found that in every instance referred to in the statements he has read, including that of Rosa Bareface and the carpenter who married Sitting Bull's daughter, these people are under the pay of the Government, are sustained by the agency, either at the agency or within half a mile of it, and the Indian police and the Army are there to give them support.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman's statement was broadly in the following words:

We could not find that there was one student of all the hundreds educated at Carlisle or Hampton, or in any of the schools off the reservations, but had gone back to savage life in a very short time, except a few who were employed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. And so I say now.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The "few" amount to sixty-nine out of seventy-three. Out of seventy-three that have come from Hampton but four have gone back to savage life.

Mr. CANNON. Does that include all that these schools have turned out?

Mr. CUTCHEON. All that have gone from Hampton.

Mr. CANNON. I spoke of Carlisle, Hampton, and the other schools.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have not the figures in regard to Carlisle; I hope to have them before I get through with the discussion.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me right here?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the many schools—the Lincoln Institute and others all over the country—that have been educating these children even before the Carlisle school was established?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I said at the beginning of my remarks that I was prepared with facts and figures to discuss only the Hampton school. I hope to have information in regard to others before we get through with this debate.

I read further from the testimony of this same lady:

This completes the list of Hampton's returned students whom I saw or heard from in Dakota. Of the four young men at the Menomonee agency in Wisconsin, three of whom I talked with, two have not done continuously as well as they might but for the temptation to drink, though both have worked well at times. One other has always been industrious. One, who completed the normal course at Hamptom, one of its first Indian graduates in 1882, I heard teach three classes very successfully. It was far better work than I have heard from some white teachers. I felt proud of our Hampton boy.

Two or three questions remain to be answered.

"If Eastern education is so effective, why not send all the Indian children to Eastern schools, and give up those of the agencies? Why not at least keep all who do go East and never return them to the dangers of reservation life?"

To the first question the sufficient answer is, you can not; the bulk of the work will always have to be done in the West. Of the forty-one thousand Indian children of school age, it can not be expected that over five thousand can be educated off the reservations; perhaps not over fifteen hundred east of the Mississippi.

As for the second, you would not get any children, with the consent of their parents, for such a purpose; and, if it were possible, would it be desirable? The love of Indian parents for their children is the strongest—it seems to me the best—trait in their character. Call it animal instinct if you will, it is the strongest hold one can have on them. It seems to me, rather, a divinely appointed means of grace and progress into better things. There are those who will yield to the temptations of camp-life—some would fall before those of civilized society—but the influence of those who take a bold stand for the right, like young Medicine Bull at Lower Brule, or who live simply honest, industrious lives, as so many of our returned students have been able to do, can not be calculated. And, it seems to me, there is a reflex influence for good in such a life for others, that a life of mere consideration of one's own advantage will miss.

We had a little colloquy here the other day in regard to the day schools. This is what Miss Ludlow says in regard to the day schools:

The day school and boarding school right among them have an influence upon an Indian community as real as a New England school-house has on an Eastern one; far less in degree—then all the more needed. It is an important fact, also, which should be well understood, that the conditions of life on the reservation are so far changing under these and other influences, that the returned student does not return to one howling waste of barbarism, but finds a progressive party to which he can ally himself for support and association, even among his own people; a progressive party in the minority, but active and increasing in numbers and strength.

"Then why not educate all in the West, and save transportation?"

The answer to that is easy, too. In the first place, there are not such facilities in the Western schools—especially for normal and industrial training—as Eastern ones afford, even counting out the great educational influence of travel and contact with Eastern civilization. If there were such facilities, irregularity of attendance and the absence of good home influence would make them of less avail. Strong confirmation of this statement comes just as I write in a letter from a missionary among the Pi-Utes of Nevada, requesting admission for a promising Indian boy at Hampton. He says:

"We have schools here at the reservation, but it is not advisable for him to attend, as they are not as good as the public schools, and, being constantly in the midst of the tribe, he unavoidably would grow up full of Indian notions."

He adds:

"I have been among these Indians for three years and have reached two conclusions:

"First. These people can be best civilized by educated teachers of their own.

"Second. Those teachers must be educated outside of reservation schools, such as those with which I am acquainted.

"In the second place, the education of Indians at Eastern schools is needed to educate white public sentiment at the East. While there is no thinning out of the Western schools, and every child brought East is a clear gain in Indian education, this impulse to Eastern public sentiment has done more than anything else to help the general cause of Indian education and civilization. Every school at the agencies—Government or mission—has felt its lift. As it has been put: It is not too much to say that every child on the reservations has shared indirectly the benefit of the Eastern schools."

I have not time to read further from what Miss Ludlow has written, but I wish to read the testimony of another well-known lady, Miss Elaine Goodale, also of the Hampton Institute, in regard to the civilization of these Indian tribes. She was among these people and also spent months in the Northwest among the Dakota Sioux. She says:

There are hundreds of Indians on almost every agency, living on and cultivating the land, who ought to receive titles, properly protected for a certain number of years. An official survey is greatly needed, and allotments should be made at once to all who desire them. I saw most striking evidences of general progress in civilization at the mission settlement before mentioned, 65 miles above Cheyenne River agency. Six years ago these were wild "blanket Indians;" now they are living in comfortable log houses, cultivating farms of from 5 to 15 acres each, cutting from one to several hundred dollars' worth of hay, wearing citizen's clothing, and most have accepted Christianity. They are nearly self-supporting, receiving only one-quarter rations, and some stay at home and follow the plow rather than make the three days' journey necessary to draw them. The women have fully kept pace with the men. I found them neatly dressed, in neatly kept and well-furnished homes, with well cared-for children.

There is an example of what education has done for the Cheyenne River Indians—not solely the education of the school-house, but also the education of the missionary, who brings with him the Christian home and sets it down in the midst of the Indians, teaching them the household arts, teaching them how to carry on a civilized home. More is to be accomplished in this way, I grant, than by the school book; but I am illustrating the fact that what we want is the immediate contact of civilization with these Indians, so that they can see civilization progressing before their eyes, see how Christian women live, how they provide for their families and bring up their children.

I read one further quotation:

The educational problem, than which nothing can be more important, was studied by me in the light of school work at all the agencies. A curious sort of logic seems to prevail regarding Government schools among the Indians. It is said that they are not doing their work perfectly, and consequently that we do not need any more of them. The truth is, that the system of reservation schools is not a system at all, but a series of disconnected experiments. The agent should not have entire responsibility for the school work at his agency, not so much because he is likely to abuse his trust by the appointment of incompetent relatives, as because the schools need more time, thought, attention, than he can by any possibility give.

* * * * * * * *

I visited six agency boarding schools, four of which impressed me as very creditable; in two the discipline and general management were particularly fine. The inferior teaching is the weakest point. These positions offer few inducements to first-rate teachers.

As to the day school, she says:

The day school in the Indian village is, to my mind, the most important and the most neglected point in the whole field. Its contact with Indian life is closer than that of any other; its influence is great and ought to be greater than it is.

And again she says:

It may easily be seen that the benefit of all this to the community is not to be measured by the average attendance in school or by the proficiency of the children in mental arithmetic or the Third Reader. It is their object-lesson in civilization. The neatly-kept rooms, the neatly-dressed teacher, the regular hours, countless details are seen and studied and more or less unconsciously imitated.

That is the strong point in the day school, that it is "an object-lesson in civilization" planted in the midst of the Indians. Miss Goodale truly says:

There is no time to be lost in fulfilling our promises to the Sioux and establishing good day schools, under competent general supervision, in every Indian village.

Of the Cheyenne River Mission school she says:

The success of the school among the Indians may be inferred from the fact that there were eighty applicants this year when only forty can be admitted.

By treaty with the Sioux people we are obliged to furnish one school-house and one teacher for every thirty children of school age of this great Sioux Nation, numbering 30,000. We have not done it. It is said to be impracticable. I do not know there is anything impracticable about it. Certainly it would be a beneficent thing if we could carry out that treaty as we are bound by our contract to do.

If we could set down in each Indian community one "little white school-house with a belfry" and a bell summoning daily the children to this interesting and beautiful "object-lesson" in civilization "it were a consummation devoutly to be wished."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Subsequently Mr. CUTCHEON was granted leave to publish with his remarks the following telegram:

CARLISLE, PA., March 17, 1886.

Hon. B. M. CUTCHEON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Letter just received. We have returned to forty-five tribes four hundred and thirty-eight pupils. I have received information that thirty-four are now employed as teachers, &c., in agency and other schools; that forty-two are working for Government at agencies; that twenty-seven are farming for themselves; that fifty-six are attending agency or other schools as pupils; that nine are employed as clerks in the stores; forty-one are reported as doing nothing. Sixty-three have died. Of the balance I have no certain information, but know that a good proportion are employed as scouts and policemen. Since school began, October, 1879, we have had one thousand and forty-one students. Of these I have sent into families hereabouts, for longer or shorter periods, seven hundred and sixteen, coming from all tribes; twenty-four being Apaches and a full proportion being Sioux, Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, and others of the so-called "bad tribes." Only seven of this whole number have been charged with criminal conduct. We always require that unsatisfactory pupils be returned to the school. Forty-two were so returned. Eighty-four are out at present. These attend school among the whites, and are mainly in excess of the number appropriated for, and without material cost to the Government.

This system qualifies for a change from tribal and reservation life to that of a citizen, and begets the desire for it. Scarcely a student but is able to take care of himself or herself among a civilized people at the end of their five years' course. So far as my somewhat extended information goes, the committee's visits to agencies seem to have been of the briefest character. I invited and urged Mr. HOLMAN to bring his committee to Carlisle. He made two promises that he would do so, but he did not. It would seem important that the coroner should at least view the corpse. I have read the speeches of Mr. CANNON and Mr. HOLMAN and others carefully, and trust that the committee will furnish the minutest report, with names of witnesses and evidence taken. Looking at the black sheep alone, the best institutions in the world will stand condemned. It is the murderers and housebreakers in the great city whose work is fully paraded in the morning papers, and not the work of the 800,000 non-criminal citizens.

In regard to the cost of Carlisle as compared to agency boarding-schools, see on page 30, near top, this year's report of Indian schools superintendent, that the per capita cost per month of agency boarding-schools is $14.55, or $174.60 per annum. Congress gave us last year $175 per capita. Our work continues and the training goes on the full twelve months. Agency boarding-schools remand their children to camp for two or three months, and education goes backward in the tribes. The industrial systems and examples are at the minimum, and the whole tendency is to consolidate, unify, and strengthen the tribes as such and create petty nations, as Choctaw, Creek, &c. Here, with a great mixture of tribes and surrounded by civilization, that feeling is broken up, and we educate in loyalty to the Government and individual manhood, which would continue and grow on to perfection in proper soil. Citizenship and industry are the great influences here, while, per contra, there is no place in the United States where citizenship and industry are at a greater discount than upon an Indian reservation. The million dollars the Indian Commissioner recommends for education this year is objected to. I hear nothing outside of Congress that warrants the views expressed. It ought to be two millions for next year. The beneficence of one man (Stephen Girard) gives nearly $500,000 annually for the education and support of eleven to twelve hundred fatherless lads from the slums of Philadelphia, who have no such claims upon him as the helpless Indian youths have upon the United States. Turn on all the light and the most competent and experienced investigation you can, both here and all over the field, and you will then adopt means big enough to release the Indian quickly from his ignorance and reservation prison.

R. H. PRATT, Capt. and Supt.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to participate in the general debate on this bill, simply because the discussion of the Indian policy, it seems to me, would perhaps have been more appropriate on a bill which it is supposed will soon be brought before the House for its consideration and action relative to the Sioux reservation. So far as the provisions of the pending bill are concerned there is not much room for discussion or controversy. The bill, in the light of existing policy, of existing treaty and existing law, has been, it seems to me, intelligently and wisely prepared in the main. I take the liberty to express this judgment because, as the older members of the House well know, I have been charged with the duty of assisting in the preparation of the Indian appropriation bill during the last four years. During that time I was rather an enthusiastic advocate of the policy of educating Indian children in the centers of civilization, and at all times urged liberal appropriations for that purpose.

During the last summer I was charged with others by this House with the duty of investigating this question, among others, on the reservations themselves, and we discharged that duty as far as it was practicable for us to do so. I did not find a single instance, in all our investigation, of any Indian child who had been educated in any of the centers of civilization who had returned to his home who had not also returned to the condition of barbarism in which his tribe was at the time he returned, except those only who were sustained and held up by having been given employment by the Federal Government.

And with all due respect to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] I have this to say to him. I think he will not find a single instance in the cases to which he has called the attention of the House where the child has sustained himself after having returned to his tribe, except where he has been given employment, and thereby has been sustained and held up by the Federal Government. I was compelled on that investigation to change my mind touching the policy of instructing Indian children in the centers of civilization. You lifted them rapidly, suddenly, from the very lowest depths of barbarism to the highest plane of our civilization. You isolated them from all their kindred, from all their original barbarous surroundings. You placed them in a position where they were surrounded only by the Anglo-Saxon civilization which we all enjoy and of which we boast as being the highest that exists. They made rapid progress. They made progress which was a marvel to all of us, and I do not mean to say that the money which was thus expended was injudiciously or unwisely expended. It illustrated to the American people everywhere in their own midst the capacity of the Indian for advancement, for development, for progress in civilization. It demonstrated the fact that he is capable of that development which shall give to him and his people a fair degree at least of Anglo-Saxon civilization. And in that respect creating a conviction of that kind everywhere, it has been useful in solving the great question of the civilization of the Indians. But beyond that I have seen no satisfactory results.

When his education has been thus completed amidst the best civilization we have, in schools to which we send our own children, where he enjoys all the advantages, all of the luxuries, if you please, of our own civilization, you hurl him down with violence into the very depths of the barbarism from which you took him.

He is there immediately surrounded by influences of a degrading character. If there is no employment given him by the Government, and if the white man does not take him by the hand and hold him up, if he does not have this assistance and this aid, the rude hand of barbarism seizes him and drags him down in every instance. He returns to his tribe, to his people, to the barbarism from which you took him, and the result is he derives no benefit from the education which you have given him.

But not so when you educate him properly in the midst of the tribal surroundings. There his daily progress is watched with interest by the tribe, and all of the beneficial influences of civilization shed their light not only over the child who is being educated, tending to elevate him, but lifts up the tribe to a greater or less extent in every instance. The tribe becomes accustomed to the elevation you give to the child, and when he finally returns to his tribe there is no shock, no sudden change, no rude awakening to conditions and influences with which he and his people are not already familiar. He returns to surroundings which have been elevated to some extent by the efforts to elevate him, for the education of the child has to some extent lifted the barbarism from the parent and from the tribe itself, and he finds no difficulty in maintaining the standard to which he has been trained.

I do not care now, sir, to pursue this subject further than to say that I will go as far as the farthest in making appropriations for the industrial education of the Indian children upon the reservations. I believe no more powerful agency can be employed to civilize the Indian and to educate his children.

The schools we have already established at Government expense, Carlisle, Salem, Genoa, Chilocco, and Haskell Institute, it is perhaps well to maintain, but I do not think it advisable to establish others remote from the reservations.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I suppose you would educate them in the English language, would you not?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir; I would.

I believe that labor and the education of the children should always go hand in hand; and when they go hand in hand in the presence of the Indian tribes they have a powerful influence in civilizing and elevating the Indian people.

I wish now to call the attention of the House for a moment to the views of one who has had long experience among the Indians as an educator, and who impressed favorably the entire committee. I shall read a portion of the testimony of this man who has been a missionary among the Indians for a long period of time. We found him engaged in his Christian work at the Pine Ridge agency among the Sioux Indians, and thought him as intelligent and as clear upon the subject of Indian education as any gentleman with whom we came in contact during all our summer work. He says in reference to this subject:

SCHOOLS ON AND SCHOOLS OFF RESERVATIONS.

As to the comparative merits of boarding schools at or near agencies where the children are educated in the presence of their own people, and surrounded by the influences, customs, and ideas, out of which the effort is being made to elevate them, and those schools in which children are taken for long distances from their homes, and surrounded wholly, for a period of years, by the atmosphere of a high civilization, and the influences which come to them from it alone, to the entire exclusion of all thought, and almost of accurate remembrance of the life which their own people are living at home, and to which they themselves must return when their school days are over, my opinion is, that the preference should be strongly in favor of the agency school. As supplementary to the work done by agency schools, and as a means for giving opportunities for higher culture and more thorough training to graduates of agency schools who prove themselves capable and desirous of it, I think the schools in the midst of civilization will accomplish a most useful work; but without the preliminary work done by the camp day school, and the agency boarding school, will accomplish very little in permanent results, and tend rather to discourage the few who are educated at them than to elevate the whole people by the influence which such pupils will be able to exert when they return to their homes. Pupils educated in the midst of their own people, and in the face of the old life which we endeavor to induce them to abandon, are subject to no shock or disappointment in going out from the schools to the camps and to take up again their life in their respective homes, and are, on that account, much stronger to maintain the standard they have acquired under the influence of their teachers. On the other hand, those who are educated at schools in centers of civilization are comparatively weak when suddenly returned among their own people, and, so far as I have been enabled to observe, have but little moral courage to maintain the standard acquired, and, exercising but little influence among the masses, tend rather to fall back themselves into the old ways utterly dispirited. It is but natural that it should be so, and unless strong and active civilizing influences are kept constantly bearing upon the people in their homes and nuclei of civilization formed to which these pupils can return and draw strength, the work put upon them in those schools will, for the most part, fade out and be lost as water poured upon the sand.

That is in accord with the testimony of every intelligent educator we met in the Indian country.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the name of this witness?

Mr. RYAN. The witness to whom I referred is Rev. William J. Cleveland. Now a word in regard to the day schools. While I do not mean to be understood as saying that the day school is a total failure I do mean to be understood as saying that the money we expend for day schools could generally be more profitably expended by using it for industrial schools on the reservations.

The day school has no attraction for the child of the savage. It should be borne in mind that members of the Indian tribes that are uncivilized send their children to school reluctantly; and therefore it has been found impracticable, in almost all cases, to maintain a day school among such tribes of Indians in any degree of efficiency. And before, in my judgment, day schools should be maintained to any extent civilization in the tribes ought to proceed so far that there should be an inclination on the part of the parents to educate their children.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he makes this as a universal statement as to the day schools, or merely as a general statement.

Mr. RYAN. I thought I had qualified my statements by saying that among the wilder tribes I think the day school is almost a total failure; that in order to maintain a day school with any degree of efficiency there must be such a degree of civilization in the tribe as has created a desire on the part of parents to educate their children. I do not refer to industrial schools; these are a grand success on all reservations.

Mr. CUTCHEON. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in that community of which I spoke on the Cheyenne River, which consisted six years ago of blanket Indians, last season they had twice as many applications for admission—and this was a mission school not a United States school—as it was possible for them to receive or accommodate? It is a matter, therefore, rather of administration, I apprehend, than otherwise.

Mr. RYAN. It may be a matter of administration, to some extent. The methods employed in administration may be judicious or they may be unwise. However, the school you refer to is, I think, an industrial school. And the point I have to make is this: That you have to beget a desire on the part of parents to educate their children before they will send them to a day school. Where the child may at will go and come the tendency among the wilder tribes is to encourage the children to stay away, and it is frequently the case that the parents go and take them out, and usually the child goes to school, if at all, so irregularly as to do it little or no good.

Now I want to say one word, Mr. Chairman, upon another question that has cropped out in this discussion and which relates perhaps more particularly to the Indian policy. That we have arrived at a period when the Congress of the United States ought to act promptly upon the idea that there must be a change of policy can not, it seems to me, be questioned. We have been pursuing a policy for many years which has had a tendency to keep the Indian in his present savage and barbarous condition rather than to lift him up to a plane of independence.

The policy has been to feed the Indian to keep him from fighting, whereas it ought also to have for its object his early preparation for self-support and the preservation of his manhood. Take, for instance, our treaty with the Sioux Indians—to my mind a most unwise treaty, prejudicial to the civilization of the Indian as any treaty that was ever made, so far as I have any knowledge of treaties. You provide in that treaty a certain amount of rations for each Indian. The provision is ample and more than ample. It is, to say the least of it, more than many of the hard-working people in this country enjoy. Then you say in the same treaty to them, "You shall have in addition to such subsistence a premium of $10 a year for roaming and hunting; you who engage in agriculture shall have a premium of $20 a head." The premium of $20 a head I can understand. It was designed to stimulate these Indians to engage in agriculture. But I never could quite understand why the Government should provide amply to feed an Indian and then in addition to that pay him $10 per annum to roam and hunt. The policy that hires these savages to roam and hunt at a compensation of $10 per capita and their subsistence besides would seem the very acme of national folly.

Now, you expect those men to engage in agriculture. What incentive have they? In the first place there is not one of them who has a spot of God's green earth he can call his own; not one. He does not know but the ground he cultivates to-day or to-morrow may be the ground tilled by another next year. He engages in agriculture only just enough to oblige the Great Father, just enough to enable the agent to make an encouraging report. He reasons: "What do I want to raise crops for? The Great Father is bound by treaty to give me my corn and cattle, and everything I need?" If you furnish him a market for what he produces he would have some incentive; but in violation of your treaty obligation you deny him such market.

Now, I want to call your attention to the testimony upon this subject of the gentleman to whose testimony upon Indian education I called the attention of the House a moment ago.

In reply to a question by Mr. RYAN, Mr. Cleveland stated:

> I can not conceive of any stronger stimulus to industry which can be brought to bear upon these people at the present time than the carrying into effect of article 5 of the treaty of 1868 in which the Government agrees to assist them in finding a market for, or in purchasing from them itself, their extra produce. If the Indians saw that bushels of potatoes, corn, &c., meant ready cash when delivered at the agency, or at some purchasing depot provided them, they would soon cease to cultivate the ground on the present insignificant scale, simply with the idea of pleasing the authorities and barely satisfying the letter of their treaty obligation, and, instead of being simply consumers, would, I am satisfied, soon convert themselves into large producers. During the past two years I have observed that the desire to earn money has increased very rapidly among them, and that wherever there is work, such as freighting, furnishing cord-wood, herding, or other things with which they are familiar and that they can do, a large portion of them are quite eager to avail themselves of any opportunity which offers. A very important consideration in this connection is that they receive cash for all work done. This disposition to earn money is growing among them.

Mr. LONG. Is not that high evidence of a tendency toward civilization?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, it is high evidence, undoubtedly, of a disposition to advance, and ought to be encouraged; but when the methods of the Government embarrass and repress it, then I say there ought to be a change of policy. My own idea is that we have arrived at a period when we can give to almost every Indian in the land his own home without power of alienation for a generation or two. It is said by some that there are tribes not fit for that; but I do not believe there are many such. I believe the time has come when civilization has pressed the Indian so far back, and is threatening to push him rapidly farther and farther toward the setting sun, that if we would protect him at all we must give him an indefeasible title to a spot which he can call his own absolutely and to which no one else can have any claim. Then what he acquires beyond that must be acquired by his industry and his thrift.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am with you there.

Mr. RYAN. The Indian Territory is no exception. The principle should apply to all the reservations, wherever it is practicable. There are, perhaps, some where it is not, but they are the exceptions. At the last session of Congress this whole subject was exhaustively discussed on this floor. Civilization had already pressed upon all sides against the Indian Territory, and invasions had been repeatedly made by persons who claimed that they had a right under existing law to go into that portion of the Territory called Oklahoma, but who, perhaps, were mistaken. This impression seems to have arisen from the fact that the Government had bought and paid for it.

At all events, the Army of the United States had to be employed again and again to keep them out and to protect the Indian in his rights. After that discussion here it seemed to be the judgment of Congress that the time had come for taking measures to secure the Indian in his right and to open that territory to white settlement. I offered an amendment to the appropriation bill, which was adopted, authorizing the President of the United States to negotiate with three of the civilized tribes—the Seminoles, the Creeks, and the Cherokees—for what is known as the Cherokee outlet and Oklahoma. For some reason, which was doubtless satisfactory to the President, whose motives I do not call in question at all, no commission was appointed and no step was taken to execute that law. A few days ago when my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] was discussing this bill in a most interesting way I asked him some questions which he chose to regard as having a partisan character. In fact, however, I did not ask him any question with a view to impugning the good faith, the purity of purpose, or the motives of any Senator or of any executive officer, but simply to remind him that the present administration seems, from his own standpoint, to be about as grievously at fault in this matter as the last one which he had so bitterly denounced on the stump. I do not myself believe that anything of a partisan character can legitimately enter into this discussion.

In the course of the debate here it was maintained that there were many reasons why the President did not execute that law. One gentleman urged that the execution of it might irritate the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, who never claimed any sort of interest in any of the lands referred to. The Secretary of the Interior, for whose ability and purity of character I have a profound respect, has urged another reason which I think can not be regarded as sufficient. The substance of his reason is that because some men had gone into that territory and were threatening to enter it again, as he thought unlawfully, he did not propose to be bulldozed. In other words, he did not deem it good policy to attempt such negotiations, although Congress had so directed, simply because there were parties threatening to go into that territory and make settlement and establish homes for themselves. I do not think that can be regarded as a sufficient reason, whether the provisions of the law were mandatory or not. It was urged here that the provisions of the law were not mandatory, but left the matter entirely in the discretion of the President, and that he was at liberty to determine whether he should enter upon the negotiation or not; but, Mr. Chairman, I have always understood it to be the rule that when Congress authorizes the President to do a thing that is equivalent to a command, because, out of respect to the Executive, mandatory language is never employed. Do gentlemen understand that when Congress expressly authorizes the Chief Executive to do a particular thing, and does not expressly provide that he may exercise his discretion in the matter, he may set up his own will and judgment against the will of the people duly expressed under constitutional forms?

Gentlemen do not want us to think that, I know. I am sure the President of the United States would wish to be delivered from friends who urged such a defense.

It was argued by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] that, so far as the Cherokee outlet is concerned, the Cherokee Nation had a lawful right to lease the same to white men, subject only to the right of the United States to take possession of any portion of this territory at any time for the settlement of friendly Indians. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas is the only lawyer who, having given the subject one moment's thought, has ever reached any such conclusion. On this point he is directly in conflict with the legal judgment of the present administration, as well as that of past administrations, and in my view he is also squarely in conflict with the express provisions of the law. If the Cherokee Nation has a right to lease for one year any portion of that Cherokee outlet ceded by them to the Government for certain purposes in 1866—if the Cherokee Nation has a right to make a lease for a year, or two years, subject only to the right of the Government to enter upon the land for the specific purpose stated in the treaty, then it has a right to cover that vast body of land with leases for any purpose under heaven, for an indefinite period.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It has done that.

Mr. RYAN. Certainly; it is already covered by leases; but I am talking about the right to do it. If they have a right to do that, then they can lawfully make a lease which will shut out settlement in that territory for all time to come, unless the Government chooses to locate friendly Indians there; and everybody knows that the Government chooses to do no such thing.

But the gentleman seemed rather weak in that position when he said, in response to a question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], that the Attorney-General had not decided that the Government had a right to put off these cattle-men, even if they were there as trespassers; and in reply to another question, he said: "Give the President the law, and he will put them out"—I think he said in sixty days. He was going to make short work of it!

[Here the hammer fell].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RYAN. Can I have just a few moments more?

Mr. WELLBORN. I would gladly accommodate the gentleman, but under the order of the House the time for debate was limited peremptorily. I will endeavor to compress my remarks as much as possible, and if I should have any time remaining I will gladly give it to the gentleman. But in justice to what I desire to say I can not yield further time now, though I would be delighted to do so if I could.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has fixed the hour at which the debate shall close, and the Committee of the Whole has no power to change it.

Mr. STORM. When will that time expire?

The CHAIRMAN. It has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] to conclude the consideration of this bill to-night?

Mr. RYAN. If it would not be objectionable to the gentleman from Texas or anybody else I would like permission to proceed perhaps about ten minutes without any encroachment on the time of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. WELLBORN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RYAN. Not more than ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. WELLBORN. I shall be compelled to object to any extension of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole has no power to change the order made by the House.

Mr. CANNON. Would it be in order to move that the committee rise so that the House may extend the time?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would be in order.

Mr. WELLBORN. When the House adopted the order limiting debate the motion to reconsider was laid on the table, so that even in the House the order could not be rescinded.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question for the House. Of course the motion that the committee rise is in order. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] insist on the motion?

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair inform me whether the motion to reconsider the order made by the House was laid on the table?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that it was.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will at any rate move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman from Texas now respond to the inquiry I made a while ago, whether it is his purpose to conclude the consideration of this bill to-night?

Mr. WELLBORN. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan that it is my purpose to conclude the general debate as soon as possible, and then I shall press the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule to as late an hour this evening as the patience of the House will allow. Whether we shall reach a conclusion to-night I am unable to say.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, when I called up this bill for consideration a few days ago my purpose was not to engage in any general debate that might be precipitated on it, and I would not now depart from the purpose then formed were it not for certain unjust criticisms and attacks made on the bill, which I can not and will not suffer to pass unchallenged. My remarks of course will be of a desultory character, because responsive strictly to these criticisms and attacks.

I shall first give attention to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. THROCKMORTON], and I do so because it seems he is the only person on this floor who has undertaken to make a general assault along the whole line against this bill.

The first criticism made by the gentleman from Texas I find near the beginning of his speech, and it is in this language:

> In common with many others I had hoped with a change in the administration of the Government there would be a change in respect to the management of the Indian affairs of the country. But it seems, in the absence of recommendations of the executive officers of the Government and from the features of this appropriation bill, we are to continue in the same old grooves, with no marked or distinctive change in the policy heretofore pursued or in a reduction of expenditures.
> On the contrary there is a decided increase in a direction not made obligatory by any treaty stipulation and justified by no good results. I allude to the increased provisions of the bill for educational purposes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to this statement of the gentleman from Texas, I shall do nothing more than place the facts of the situation before the committee. The amount carried by this bill is, in round numbers, five million and a half of dollars, being $274,000 less than the bill of the last year. The increase to which the gentleman from Texas alludes, that of educational items, is $14,350. Yet the gentleman emphasizes the slight increase for educational purposes, and utterly ignores the large reduction of $274,000 in the aggregate of the bill.

Leaving out of count the small increase in the educational appropriations, the reduction in the bill is $299,000 as compared with the bill of last year, while the increase to which the gentleman refers is only $14,350. And yet he says that there is no "marked or distinctive change in the reduction of expenditures, but, on the contrary, a decided increase in a direction not warranted by treaty stipulation," &c.

All I ask is that the intelligent representatives who constitute this great presence will take the facts of the situation and compare them with the statement of the gentleman from Texas, and then each for himself draw his own conclusion.

The next criticism of the gentleman from Texas on the bill relates to the Indian agencies. He says he would reduce these agencies by abolishing some and consolidating others. After this reduction has been effected he would then detail officers from the Army to act as Indian agents. If the gentleman from Texas will examine Title XXVIII of the Revised Statutes of the United States he will find there is a general provision that the President may in his discretion appoint any military officer to discharge the duties of an Indian agent. To incorporate in this bill a peremptory provision that an Indian agent shall be taken from the Army would be a manifest change of existing law; and I am sure my colleague from Texas is not so unfamiliar with the rules of the House as not to know that a provision changing existing law is out of order on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WELLBORN. Certainly.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I wish to say that nowhere in the remarks I submitted the other day did I presume this bill could be amended in that respect. I only suggested that in the future the Indian policy should be corrected by some bill for that purpose. But I said nowhere it was to be done in this bill.

Mr. WELLBORN. That is a sufficient answer then to the House of the criticism in this respect the gentleman has made on this particular bill.

But I can not permit the gentleman's criticism on this question to pass unchallenged. I enter an earnest but emphatic protest against his proposition to detail Army officers to perform the duties of civil life. But I do not believe with the gentleman from Texas, that Army officers are better qualified for the duties of Indian agents than men drawn from civil life. True, many of them have had experience with the Indians, as suggested by the gentleman, but has not this experience been in fighting them in the field rather than in managing and directing them as is the custom at Indian agencies. Intelligence, integrity, and firmness, I take it, are the leading qualities necessary to make an efficient agent. Find these qualities combined in a man in civil life and give him a few months experience with the Indians and he will make as good or better agent than an Army officer. Besides, I believe in confining Army officers strictly to their appropriate Army spheres. If there is a redundancy of officers in the Army, this would be an excellent reason for reducing their number but not for placing them in positions which should be properly and rightfully filled by civilians. Besides, experience has shown that the management of Indian affairs under Army officers is far more extravagant than under civilians. A notable instance of this, I am advised by the Indian Office, is presented by this bill. The Arapaho and Cheyenne agency is in charge of an Army officer, who is a gentleman of superior intelligence, an officer of fine military attainments, and in every respect a true soldier. Yet, I am told by the same authority, that this is one of the most, if not the most, extravagant agencies in the whole service. In the very nature of things it does not seem to me that military education would develop those qualities necessary to an economic administration of civil affairs.

I have before me an interesting speech on the question of detailing Army officers for civil duties from one of the most illustrious, greatest, and grandest men that ever represented Texas in the American Congress, General Houston. The occasion of the speech was the consideration of what was known as the civil appropriation bill. In this bill was an appropriation of $300,000 for continuing work on the custom-house in New Orleans. An amendment to this appropriation was proposed to the effect that no Army officer should be placed in charge of the work, nor detailed to act as assistant superintendent or architect in the construction of the building, &c. This amendment gave rise to debate upon the general question of employing Army officers in civil duty. I quote one or two extracts from General Houston's speech:

> This subject is one in which I have felt some interest, and after the discussion which has taken place, I should not deem myself discharging my duty, if I did not advance such objections as I think exist to the general plan of selecting military officers from the Army for the purpose of discharging civil duties.

* * * * * * *

To employ them in civil capacities is injustice to the community in general. It cuts off all competition. There is no encouragement for persons in civil life to qualify themselves for such trusts when they are precluded as they must be by the employment of the officers of the Army. If officers of the Army are to be selected for the surveys of rivers and harbors and the construction of all public works, civilians will lose the stimulus necessary to keep up that rivalry and emulation which is beneficial to society and redounds to the justice of the citizens. Why, sir, you are told these are gentlemen of scientific qualifications. Be it so, but their science is abstract, not practical. These are practical matters and require men of practical sense to accomplish them. It is not a gentleman who has acquired all the science of figures on the blackboard, and who has made the prettiest forts for imaginary warfare, who can do such things in practical reality.

Furthermore, these gentlemen are appropriate to the Army. Their business is to fight in time of war, and in time of peace to qualify themselves for the discharge of their duties in war. If we were to rely alone on the officers to discharge all the civil trusts, and it should become necessary to marshal our forces on our own soil or to invade a foreign country, of course these gentlemen will be withdrawn from their employment in civil life and ordered to the Army; and what then will become of all these improvements which require military men of science? When you withdraw these gentlemen, whose science and knowledge have been appropriated to these purposes, you leave a complete blank in the practical affairs of the country, and nothing can be done that is necessary to be done in that way. But we are told so many of these officers are educated from time to time in the Military Academy and if we do not employ them in this way they will be idle. If they are educated at the Military Academy it is a preference of accident or design by which they receive that advantage from the country. If they do not choose to return to the walks of civil life, but appropriate themselves exclusively to the Army, let them compete with each other in everything that is officer-like and military, and not block the path of civilians to preferment and pecuniary advantage appropriate to their spheres. Confine the officers strictly to the trusts confided to them by the Government and give them a fair recompense, but let civilians strike forward and compete for that position to which they are entitled.

Thus it will be seen that General Houston took strong, bold, aggressive ground against the proposition to employ Army officers in civil pursuits, though I concede, as already indicated, that he was discussing the question not with reference to the Indian service but other civil employments. He stoutly maintained the propriety of restraining Army officers strictly to their appropriate military duties.

Mr. Chairman, I do not use these extracts in the hope of changing the opinions of the gentleman from Texas, but, following the analogy of the old story about Blackstone, I read them merely to show the gentleman how outrageously mistaken on this question was the grand old hero of San Jacinto. [Laughter.]

The next criticism the gentleman indulges on the bill relates to alleged wastefulness and extravagance in the Indian service. In illustration and proof of his criticism in this respect he has cited two agencies in the Indian Territory, the Cheyenne and Arapaho agencies, and has given the number and the compensation of the employés at them.

I have not had an opportunity, or if I have had have not availed myself of it, to examine and compare the official register with the statement of the gentleman from Texas, but I assume, of course, that the statement he made is correct. To the enumeration of these employés and their salaries I make no objection; but I do object to the gentleman's statement of the uses to which, by implication at least, he asserts that some of the employés at these agencies are devoted.

I will read the paragraphs to which I have reference. I now quote from his own speech:

Then, sir, may I not ask was it ever contemplated that these unpretentious requirements in the treaties for agents, interpreters, physicians, engineers, farmers, teachers, blacksmiths, carpenters, and millers should be supplemented with from twenty-five to sixty additional employés, including butchers to slaughter animals for the most expert butchers in the world—

I stop right here, Mr. Chairman, to say that the beef provided by the Government for the support of the Indians is issued, of course, in rations to them, and any one acquainted with the Indian character knows that it would not do to permit the wild savage to slaughter the animals for himself. But this is not the material point I am considering. But note the following:

for cooks to prepare dainty food for a people reared on raw and half-roasted food—

What does that mean? It implies that the Indian Office is employing "cooks," to use the gentleman's own language, to prepare dainty food for the savage Indians who have been reared on raw or half-roasted food. Why, there is not on the American continent employed in the Indian service a cook for any such purpose. But further the gentleman says—bakers to prepare bread for savages who were raised on roasted acorns and mesquite beans—

The same remark applies to that statement. Bakers are not employed for the purpose of preparing food for the wild savage. But further—for herders to attend cattle for the most perfect horsemen on earth—

In passing, in reference to that it may be proper to say that at some agencies it has been shown by experience that it is in the interest of economy to purchase cattle not only alive, but sometimes to purchase them with a view of pasturing them for months. Of course between the date of purchase and the date of slaughtering the animals for consumption they must be cared for by herders—for tailors and seamstresses and laundresses to cut and make garments and keep them nicely laundried for people who wear breech-clouts and blankets.

But mark next—

Now, what does that mean? It implies, Mr. Chairman, that the Indian service, the Government of the United States, yea, a Democratic administration, is employing tailors and seamstresses and laundresses, as the gentleman from Texas says, to cut garments and keep them nicely laundried for a savage race who wear breech-clouts and blankets!

Now, it is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, surely for me to enter the statement here that nowhere in the Indian service can a tailor or seamstress or laundress be found who is used for any such purpose.

But, further, the gentleman says:

In answer to this it may be said—

Ah! in answer. Then the gentleman from Texas knew that there was an answer to this feeble attempt at wit and ridicule—

In answer to this it may be said that these butchers, cooks, tailors, herders, bakers, laundresses, matrons, and seamstresses are not used for the Indians, but are used for the employés and industrial schools. If this is so, it is high time an end was put to it. Why should not the agent, physician, and other employés provide for their own butchering, cooking, washing, laundrying, &c.?

I answer, Mr. Chairman, that they do. Nor is there in the whole Indian service a cook, a baker, a tailor, a matron, a seamstress, or a laundress, except those employed in the Indian schools. And right here I want to state—of course these facts are not stated on my own personal knowledge, but on the authority of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—that all of the agents and other employés at the various agencies, outside of their salaries, receive no other emoluments whatever except the rents of the houses they occupy. The furniture—household and kitchen furniture—is bought and paid for by the agent or employé as the case may be.

Mr. Chairman, I regret extremely the necessity which has constrained me to tax the patience of the committee with these details; but, sir, the irregular and unlawful practices, as charged by the gentleman from Texas, are matters of the gravest moment; and, going out to the country without challenge or contradiction, necessarily create the impression that the executive officers of this Government who are charged with the conduct of Indian affairs are not only constantly violating the law but are grossly prostituting to improper uses the lawful agencies of the service. It may not be improper to inquire here, who is the executive officer of the Government directly responsible for the management of Indian affairs? Is he an official devoid of experience and intelligence? Is he an official of questionable personal integrity? Is he an official disposed to profligacy and extravagance? Why, sir, it is a sufficient answer to these questions to say that J. D. C. Atkins is the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs—a gentleman whose high fortune it was to serve for twenty years upon this floor, five years of which time he was at the head of the Committee on Appropriations; and during all this long period of honorable service he testified by his acts the existence within himself of those qualities which constitute excellence in a public character and pre-eminently distinguished himself as an economist. During his legislative career his energies were largely devoted to the reduction of public expenditures and the economic administration of the Government in all its branches. This able and worthy official is incapable of sanctioning the irregular, unlawful, and vicious practices which it has been the pleasure of the gentleman from Texas to charge against the Indian service.

But, Mr. Chairman, is the Indian service an extravagant service? Right here let me say that in round numbers the Indian bill, this bill, carries five and a half million dollars. Assume that there are two hundred and sixty thousand Indians in the country, and you have a little more than $21 for each Indian for the year. Now, I want to read in this connection an extract from the report of the last Indian Commissioner. He says:

I am not aware that any report from this office has ever shown just how much the Government contributes from the United States Treasury to feed and clothe the two hundred thousand Indians who are its wards, outside of the five civilized tribes. The public at large finds from the proceedings of Congress and the public press that $5,000,000 in round numbers have been appropriated for the Indian service, and this gives to each Indian $25, which, if true, would not enable any person, either white or Indian, to live very luxuriously, for it is a fraction less than 7 cents a day. But small as this is, it is by no means the worst feature of the case, because after deducting from the $5,000,000 the money due the Indians, and which the Government only holds in trust for them, and then deducting cost of transportation and other legitimate and necessary expenses, it is found, by a careful examination of the accounts, that the Indians actually get of the money belonging to the Government, to feed and clothe them, only about $7 per annum per capita, or a fraction less than 2 cents a day for each Indian. It takes from the Treasury of the Government $1,000 a year for each soldier in our Army, whose chief business it is to see that peace is preserved on the frontier, while it takes from the same source for each Indian only $7.

Now, gentlemen sit here on this floor year after year and vote $25,000,000 to the support of the Army—$1,000 for each soldier, whose chief business it has been to hold the Indian in subjection and protect the whites from hostile irruptions and predatory incursions; and yet when a bill is presented accomplishing the same purpose at one-fifth the cost and in a peaceable and more effectual method they lift their hands in holy horror at the enormity of the appropriation. I say to the gentlemen, if they are earnestly in search of some method of reducing expenditures cut down the appropriation for the Army; it is no longer needed as of yore for Indian purposes. Thank God, in the grand march of events there has been discovered a less expensive and more effectual and more peaceable method of dealing with the Indians than through the bloody instrumentalities that inevitably pertain to the military arm of the Government.

There have been but two Indian policies, the war policy and the peace policy. The former at enormous cost restrains and controls, for the time being, without any ultimate good, by the application of force. The latter, at immeasurably less cost, restrains and controls and elevates for all time by making the individual Indian a better and more intelligent man.

The gentleman from Texas says, were it in his power he would remit the Indian Bureau to Army management. My prayer is, that such a dire calamity may never befall the Republic and particularly the Indian tribes within its borders.

There is another view, however, of this question of alleged extravagance. In considering the provisions which we are now making for the support and civilization of the Indians and the provisions which are yet to be made for them it is well to remember what have been our transactions with them in the past. Through these transactions we to-day own what once they possessed. These transactions, with some notable exceptions, are anything but creditable to our people and our Government. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think I venture not too much when I say that the history of the Indian race since its contact with the white race has been a dark record on the part of the latter of violated treaties and neglected promises, of fraudulent devices and treacherous practices. Why, sir, so long has this course been persisted in that we have entirely forfeited the confidence of the Indian.

I read a few days ago an amusing incident illustrating the opinion which the Indian has of the white man. The incident referred to occurred in an interview between an Arapaho chief, Little Raven, and the then Commissioner of Indian Affairs, some eighteen years ago. This interview is thus substantially related by the Commissioner: I endeavored, he says, to explain to Little Raven something of heaven and something of hell; and I told him all good men, white and red, went to heaven and all bad ones went to hell. Little Raven laughed immoderately. I inquired the cause of his merriment. When he recovered his breath he said: "I am much pleased with what you tell me of heaven and hell and the characters that go to each place. Good notion! Heap good! for if all the white men are like those I know, when the Indian goes to heaven very few white men will trouble him there; pretty much all go to t'other place." [Laughter.]

I heard another incident related a few days ago in the room of the Committee on Indian Affairs by Reverend Doctor Sunderland: An Indian chief from the Northwest on a visit to Washington said, in a conversation with an official in the Indian Office—perhaps, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. STORM in the chair] you remember the incident, "I do not want you to send to us any more of your white men from Washington. Our people do not want them among us, because they are all liars, and the bald-headed ones are the worst liars." [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, seriously, we have seized, as some one has said, upon the Indian's heritage, and it is a grand and magnificent heritage. Through its seizure, the Indian to-day is an alien and a stranger in his native land—a land within whose bosom the bones of his ancestors have slept for centuries. Sir, when I throw my eye upon this map of the Republic; when I reflect on its mighty domain, reaching from the great lakes of the north to our southern sea, and covering the vast stretch between the two oceans that wash our eastern and western shores; when I reflect that this vast imperial territory has been wrested from the Indian race without any sort of adequate compensation, I am filled with amazement that gentlemen should complain that this Government is dealing too liberally with the Indian. Not only am I filled with amazement; but, sir, the depressing conviction forces itself upon my mind that in the sight of Him who holds in His hand the destinies of nations, as well as the fortunes of individuals, no atonement will be acceptable for the multiplied wrongs done the Indian race save the elevation of the remaining Indians to the plane of our civilization, and their investiture with the richest of earthly boons—American citizenship. [Applause.]

The next critcism of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTEN] on this bill relates to the educational items. With all kindness to my colleague, I must say that his remarks on this subject, with their usual proneness to error, strike at the very best features of the bill. Mr. Chairman, I repeat there is no feature of the bill, in my judgment more valuable, none to which I would cling with greater tenacity than the educational feature. Mr. Chairman, the education of the Indian is imperatively demanded by two considerations:

First. As an act of justice.

Second. As a measure of public economy. And by education, let me say right here that I mean not merely the knowledge acquired from books, but instruction also in all the manual avocations of civilized life. Teach them to become farmers, blacksmiths, carpenters, shoemakers, mechanics, in a word all the manual trades common among us, and along with this give them the rudiments of an English education—reading, writing, and arithmetic. None of the industrial schools on or off the reservations undertake to do more.

Reversing the order of the statement of these reasons, let us look at the question first from an economical standpoint. The Indians are here, and were before we came, and two hundred thousand of them, say, uncivilized. What shall we do with them? Pen them up on their reservations and butcher them as cattle? Even a man with a heart of adamant would condemn this. Shall they remain in their present condition and continue a perpetual charge upon the Government? No one will say "yes." What, then, is to be done? All answer, force them to work, and thus make them self-supporting. In this I concur most heartily. But how is it to be accomplished?

By immediately withholding from them the subsistence which the Government is now furnishing, and thus forcing them to labor? Why, Mr. Chairman, what would be the effect of this? There are twenty-seven thousand of the wild Sioux in Dakota, six or seven thousand Apaches in Arizona, of the ninety-three thousand Indians in the Indian Territory nineteen thousand of them may be said to be uncivilized, or but partially so; in a word, there are scattered through different sections of the country, in round numbers, two hundred thousand of the uncivilized tribes. Suppose you suddenly withdraw the aid the Government is now giving, and thus reduce them to starving conditions, they would inevitably leave their reservations and scatter devastation and ruin broadcast over the land; and to remedy this state of things would cost the Government money enough to feed them for a hundred years. What, then, is to be done? The gentleman from Illinois says, give them at once allotments of land in severalty, accompanied with the injunction, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread all the days of thy life." The injunction is wise and of divine inspiration, and should be applied whenever possible; but the Indian must be fitted for civilized pursuits before he can follow them. The last step in the progress of the Indian toward civilization is the allotment to him of his lands in severalty; I mean to say rather, the last step is the breaking up of his tribal relations, and the individualizing of the man by allotting to him his lands in severalty.

This, however, I repeat, is the last step in the progress toward civilization. Before it can be ventured upon preparatory stages must be be passed. And right here is the vulnerable point in the argument of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The gentleman has not magnified the importance of allotting to the Indians their lands in severalty. The infirmity of his argument is that he has set the wrong time to do it. Why, Mr. Chairman, I can scarcely sketch in my own mind a picture more fearful, more terrific than would be the reality following the execution of the plan of the gentleman from Illinois. Suppose a day were fixed for its execution. Suppose the day be to-morrow. On that day, before the sun goes down, the reservation lines are all wiped out, the Indian is put upon his allotment and told to labor. The white men pour into the reservations and make their settlements. How long, think you, could the Indians remain upon their separate allotments? How long, think you, would it be before they would begin to gather in predatory bands? Why, Mr. Chairman, think of it! Turn loose two hundred thousand untamed Indians upon this country, and two millions of armed soldiers would be inadequate to the protection of the lives and property of our people.

It is true, sir, that ultimately the Indian would be subdued and exterminated; but only after the expenditure of billions of treasure and the sacrifice of thousands of precious lives. I repeat, sir, that the allotment of lands to the Indians in severalty is important—indeed, it is the great goal toward which the philanthropy and the justice of this Government are tending; but it is the final step, and before it is taken the Indian must be prepared for it. I may state in passing that the Committee on Indian Affairs have now in process of preparation a bill looking to this end, and I will state, moreover, that there are to-day in existence several Indian tribes which are ready for this allotment as soon as the necessary legislation is perfected. But, I again repeat, as my friend from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] has suggested, that before you destroy the commune and establish individual ownership of property among the Indians they must be fitted for the change by preparatory stages, and I declare to-day as my solemn, deliberate judgment that the only adequate preparation will be found to be through the education of the Indians.

By education, let me repeat with emphasis because I wish not to be misunderstood, I mean not merely the knowledge acquired from books; I mean also instruction which will enable them to become farmers and mechanics, and, in short, will prepare them for all the various manual avocations of life. Along with such instruction I would give them the ordinary rudiments of an English education. I am met with the proposition that the Federal Government has not the constitutional power to educate the Indians.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON], and perhaps others, the other day, by questions propounded to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and by one or two sentences in his speech, questioned the constitutional power of the Federal Government to educate the Indians beyond the requirements of treaty stipulations. I was gratified at the promptitude with which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] answered those questions, and also by the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] that it had been the uniform practice of the Government to protect the white citizens of the country through the instrumentality of the Army, and that if the protection of this Government could be extended in that manner it certainly could be given by other equally efficient means.

If I had to answer this question, however, as to the constitutional power of the Government to educate the Indians beyond treaty stipulations, I should put it, as I understood the gentleman from Indiana to do, upon the police power of the Government, not only incidentally drawn from express provisions, but the police power which pertains to the Government by reason of its very existence.

But aside from all that, appropriations for this purpose have been too long sanctioned by usage to be now an open question. Why, sir, before this present Union was formed, we find the Continental Congress under the old articles of confederation anpropriating money to educate Indian youths at Dartmouth College. Sixty-seven years ago the American Congress enacted a law appropriating $10,000 for the education of the Indians; and the law was based upon considerations of charity and benevolence to the Indians. As this was the first law making appropriations upon this subject, I will give it in full.

An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purposes of providing against the further decline and final extinction of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements of the United States, and for introducing among them the habits and arts of civilization, the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, in every case where he shall judge improvement in the habits and condition of such Indians practicable, and that the means of instruction can be introduced with their own consent, to employ capable persons of good moral character to instruct them in the mode of agriculture suited to their situation; and for teaching their children in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and performing such other duties as may be enjoined, according to such instructions and rules as the President may give and prescribe for the regulation of their conduct, in the discharge of their duties.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the annual sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act; and an account of the expenditure of the money, and proceedings in execution of the foregoing provisions, shall be laid annually before Congress.

Approved March 3, 1819. (United States Statutes at Large, volume 3, pages 516, 517.

When that law was passed, the War Office, which then had charge of Indian affairs, formulated at once rules and regulations to execute the purpose of Congress. Not only that; but in 1822, three years afterward, Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War under President Monroe, made a report to Congress in which he used language to which I desire to call the particular attention of those gentlemen who now insist that the Government has no power to educate the Indian races of this continent. Before reading the language of Mr. Calhoun I wish to state in passing that I have carefully searched the record of the proceedings of Congress in reference to that appropriation, and I find not even a doubt broached in either branch of Congress upon the constitutional power of the Government to make the appropriation. Here is what Mr. Calhoun, as Secretary of War, said:

Unless some system can be devised gradually to change this relation, and with the progress of education to extend over them our laws and authority, it is feared that all efforts to civilize them, whatever flattering appearances they may for a time exhibit, must ultimately fail. Tribe after tribe will sink, with the progress of our settlements and the pressure of our population, into wretchedness and oblivion. Such has been their past history, and such, without this change of political relation, it must probably continue to be. To effect it, many difficulties present themselves. It will require the co-operation of the General Government and the States within which the Indians may reside. With a zealous and enlightened co-operation it is, however, believed that all difficulties may be surmounted, and this wretched, but in many respects noble race, be ultimately brought within the pale of civilization. Preparatory to so radical a change in our relation toward them, the system of education which has been adopted ought to be put into extensive and active operation. This is the foundation of all other improvements. It ought gradually to be followed with a plain and simple system of laws and government such as has been adopted by the Cherokees; a proper compression of their settlements, and a division of landed property. By introducing gradually and judiciously these improvements, they will ultimately attain such a state of intelligence, industry, and civilization as to prepare the way for a complete extension of our laws and authority over them.

* * * * * * * *

As far, however, as civilization may depend on education only, without taking into consideration the force of circumstances, it would seem that there is no insuperable difficulty in effecting the benevolent intention of the Government. It may be affirmed, almost without qualification, that all of the tribes within our settlements and near our borders are even solicitous for the education of their children. With the exception of the Creeks, they have everywhere freely and cheerfully assented to the establishment of schools, to which, in some instances, they have contributed. The Choctaws in this respect have evinced the most liberal spirit, having set aside $6,000 of their annuity in aid of the schools established among them. The reports of the teachers are almost uniformly favorable, both as to the capacity and docility of their youths. Their progress appears to be quite equal to that of white children of the same age, and they appear to be equally susceptible of acquiring habits of industry. At some of the establishments a considerable portion of the supplies are raised by the labor of the scholars and teachers.

With these indications, it would seem that there is little hazard in pronouncing that, with proper and vigorous efforts, they may receive an education equal to that of the laboring portion of our community.

Mr. Chairman, when I heard the expressions of gentlemen on this floor a few days ago questioning the constitutional power of the Federal Government to educate Indians beyond treaty requirements, and when I afterward read this language of John C. Calhoun, sanctioning and approving not only the constitutionality but the expediency of these appropriations, I could, but for the sake of his world-wide fame, breathe an earnest, fervent prayer that in the providence of God it had been granted to the great Carolinian to have gathered wisdom from the lips of our modern statesmen, in order that he might not have departed so far from constitutional paths.

But, Mr. Chairman, not only is the education of the Indian race demanded as a measure of public economy, but it is also demanded as an act of justice to make appropriations for this. Do you ask me upon what I rest this duty? Let me here quote from a speech of Senator Houston touching this point:

Sir, let us cast our thoughts back some centuries ago. When from the rock of Plymouth an Indian chief descried the white sail of the Mayflower approaching he fixed his eye upon it, fancying it was some spirit of the deep coming toward him, and little did he anticipate that the wrongs of his people were then commencing. We came like the serpent into the garden of Eden, insidiously, when no danger was apprehended, with suggestions of kindness and of friendship. The white men were received by the Indians, were supplied with the articles which they needed. The serpent was believed, and the peace and happiness of a world destroyed by that confidence; and, sir, when the Indian nations received the white man here, they were betrayed and ruined. Overconfidence has destroyed them, and though, under Providence, great benefits have been conferred upon humanity, and I rejoice in it, it furnishes no reason why we should continue the wrong and perpetuate the injury. Sir, the Israelites in their exodus, when bitten by serpents, looked upon the symbol in the wilderness and were healed; but the Indians have found nothing to heal the injury which has been inflicted upon them by the white man. A Redeemer was given to the world, but the Indians have as yet found no savior. They have no salvation to look to but in the justice of this Government. Is it not time that justice, tardy justice, be done?

And so, I answer, not upon treaty stipulations. What care we for treaties? What regard has been shown to them in the past? We have adhered to them just so long as it suited our convenience to do so. But whenever they have stood in the way of the advancing, swelling, surging tide of white emigration and civilization, they have been swept away as straws before a mountain torrent. I will tell you the ground upon which I place the duty of this Government to educate the Indian tribes within our borders. Not, as I have just said, upon narrow and flimsy foundations of treaty stipulations, but keeping in view the great fact that we have to-day without adequate compensation the best, the richest part of the Indian's heritage, the fairest heritage on which the sun shines, I place the duty of the Federal Government to educate him upon the great principles of eternal justice, principles ordained by the councils of nature before the birth of time, regulating and to continue regulating the affairs of men until the last page of human history has been written, and then, when earthly establishments are gone, destined still to be administered throughout the infinite ages of eternity. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize the criticism I have made in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. That gentleman, always able, is usually deliberate and conservative, but I think this House has never listened to more reckless counsel than that which he gave it a few days ago; and particularly was he unwise when he invited us to take the back track. "Let us," he said, "take the back track and get on the right track." I say to the gentleman from Illinois that we are now upon the right track and that we have been upon the right track for four years, ever since, under the auspices of the gentleman and his associates on the Committee on Appropriations, the real, practical work of Indian education was begun under the advice of Mr. Calhoun given sixty-seven years ago. We are on the right track. I tell you the education of the Indian race of America is the solvent of the Indian problem.

I want to say a a word in reference to the position of my colleague touching Indian schools. There are three classes of Indian schools. The question of education is the important one, and should be settled in some way or other. There is the Indian day school upon the reservation; then there is the industrial boarding school upon the reservation; then there is the industrial training school off the reservation.

In reference to the third class of schools there is a diversity of public sentiment. Some maintain the schools off the reservations are not of sufficient value to justify the expenditure; others maintain they are, and that they should be maintained. For one, I believe these schools off the reservations are valuable and ought to be supported. I would not expand the system, but I would keep it up to its present dimensions.

"But, oh," gentlemen tell us, "when the infant Ute goes back from these reservation schools he resolves back into barbarism! You must remember, Mr. Chairman, this system is still tentative. It has been in existence only three or four years, and I concede if you take one youth educated at Carlisle and put him back among his tribe he will yield to his associations and adopt the habits and customs of savage life again. But let me say this before I pass, that the education he received at Carlisle, the aspirations there implanted in his bosom for a higher destiny are not dead; they simply slumber.

Now sir, these Indian schools are sending these increased numbers of educated Indian youths back to the Indian tribes. Carlisle is sending from forty to fifty. The Lincoln Institute is sending some, and the Lawrence school at Kansas is sending some. So if we maintain this system we will soon have in every tribe an association, so to speak, a nucleus which barbarism will not be able to crush out, a nucleus of civilization leading to grand results which will spread all over the Indian tribes.

For that reason I would maintain the industrial schools off the reservations.

Now, in reference to the industrial schools on the reservations there is but one sentiment. No gentlemen who have given this subject considerate thought—or rather I will put the statement in this shape: During the time these schools have been in existence, and I have been in the position to come into contact with gentlemen who have given them careful thought and attention, I have never heard but one dissenting voice as to the practical value of these schools, and that was the voice of the gentleman from Texas a few days ago.

Now, the last class of schools is the Indian day school, and that is the school which the gentleman from Texas would perpetuate; but I declare to you to-day that the only question in reference to them is whether they are of sufficient value to merit any appropriation at all. He would repudiate the two schools which confessedly confer benefits on the Indian himself and encourage that Indian day school which seems to be of less value than any other.

Now, let me say in conclusion that we must not take the back track. Let me tell you again we are on the right move, and unless obstructed the train is in motion, and it is moving forward, its speed is increasing from day to day, and unless obstructed in its progress it will soon reach its point of destination, of civilization and citizenship of the American Indian. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I, for one, have an abiding faith that this issue will be reached at no distant day. I have faith, sir, in the American people. I believe the solution of the Indian question has been discovered. I believe that the American people have the intelligence and the courage to complete it. I have unfaltering confidence in the manhood of this country, in its intelligence, its integrity, and its courage, and I have reason for this confidence, as have all of us, because its loftiness, whether developed in northern latitudes or beneath southern skies has been signally illustrated at every stage in our country's growth.

Mr. Chairman, to this manhood, whose wisdom has been approved in peace and courage illustrated in war, now that it is thoroughly aroused to the magnitude and the pressing exigency of this Indian problem, may be safely left its settlement, and that settlement will be effected upon terms just to the Indian and honorable to our Government. God speed the day when it will be thus settled! God speed the day when this wretched, this unfortunate people, through the benevolence and through the energy of the American people and the American Government, will be rescued from degradation and barbarism and lifted to the plane of our own civilization and fitted for the duties and responsibilities and the blessings of American citizenship. When that day does come, sir, better satisfied will we be with ourselves as American citizens, while humanity everywhere will break forth in praise and plaudit over the noblest consummation which on this planet public justice, quickened by private philanthropy, has yet been permitted to achieve. [Applause.]

I now ask that the committee proceed to consider this bill by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, namely.

Mr. WELLBORN. By direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 1, after the word "Department" insert the words "for the year ending June 30, 1887."

Mr. WELLBORN. That needs no explanation. In the bill the fiscal year is not fixed. This amendment simply fixes it.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of sixty agents of Indian affairs at the following-named agencies, at the rates respectively indicated, namely:

* * * * * * *

At the Navajo agency, at $2,000.
At the Mescalero agency, at $1,800.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I sought to obtain the floor while the Clerk was reading the provision providing for the pay of the agent at the Pueblo agency. I sought the floor to inquire of the gentleman from Texas, the gentleman in charge of this bill, whether the committee has considered the propriety of reducing the number of these agencies or of consolidating some of them with others, especially agencies of this class. The gentleman from Texas will remember, of course, that this Pueblo agency is located at Santo Fé, and there is no reservation in this immediate neighborhood. The Pueblo Indian reservations extend over a wide portion of New Mexico and are generally small communes of people who are entirely self-supporting. They have in their midst, at a somewhat central point, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church, an industrial boarding school partly supported by the Government, and it does not seem to me that any benefit can result from perpetuating that agency.

Mr. WELLBORN. I will state, Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Indiana, that the Committee on Indian Affairs has had this matter of consolidating certain agencies under consideration, and I suppose I violate no confidence of the committee-room when I say it is the judgment of the committee that certain agencies can be consolidated. I do not know that we had the particular one mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana under consideration, but there were a number of agencies mentioned, principally in Washington Territory, around Puget Sound——

Mr. PEEL (from his seat). This one was considered.

Mr. WELLBORN. I am informed by the gentleman from Arkansas that in reference to this there was a question. The committee took under consideration the propriety of the consolidation of the agencies; but inasmuch as they are provided for in the last appropriation bill we concluded that it would be perhaps obnoxious to the rule of the House to abolish any of those provided for, and the conclusion of the committee, therefore, was to prepare a general provision or general bill in relation to the subject, consolidating all of those agencies that we believed ought to be consolidated and to abolish those which were unnecessary. It was not deemed wise, however, to undertake it here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that any question would be raised as to the power of Congress, or of the House under its rules, to omit an appropriation. The agency, it is true, can not be abolished in a formal way, but the mere failure to appropriate the money——

Mr. WELLBORN. If it be an office provided by law what would be the attitude of the Government toward the officer?

Mr. HOLMAN. I certainly do not think we have placed ourselves in the extraordinary attitude that an unnecessary office must be appropriated for.

Mr. WELLBORN. Not at all; but we have placed ourselves in this attitude, that in the judgment of this House it is unwise to legislate on appropriation bills. If the office becomes unnecessary, remove it by proper instrumentalities, but hold the appropriation bill to its legitimate functions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no motion is pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion is to strike out the clause.

I apprehended that some injury to the public service might result from the abolition of a rule which had been found to work admirably in the interest of the Government for some ten years, but if the result has been reached under our rules that you can not abolish on an appropriation bill an unnecessary office but must appropriate the full amount required by some existing law, why then the injury done is quite serious.

Mr. WELLBORN. I do not, of course, question the power of the House to fail to appropriate.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House, I presume, is scarcely prevented from refusing to make an appropriation even by the present rules. But if such be the fact we ought to retrace our steps at once.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana what is his deliberate judgment as to whether, if we fail to appropriate for this agency, the agency still continuing by law, there would be a deficiency?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose not. I suppose it would result in the discontinuance of the agency, and that the agent would have no more claim on the Government at the termination of the present fiscal year. I believe it would be so held by the Department. I think where Congress has failed to make an appropriation of money for an office it has never been held that the present person holding that office might go into the Court of Claims to enforce his claim.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last clause of this provision in order to say a word or two with regard to this particular agency. And I do so because a great many others are in the same condition. It is proposed that the Indians shall be placed in a condition of self-support, and that we shall approach that condition of things gradually, not rashly, so as to defeat the object we have in view. The truth is the Pueblos are about as well advanced as the population around them. They are in every sense self-supporting. You do not appropriate a dollar for their support and have never done so. They are an industrious body of farmers, not very progressive, I admit, but still they have been in a comparatively civilized condition for many generations, not only self-supporting, but in the main a comparatively intelligent body of people.

These pueblos are communes. The Pueblo Indians live in houses of the same class of houses as you find generally in New Mexico, that came down to them from the last generation. If the intention of Congress is to keep agencies to make the Indians self-supporting, then where you apply no money for their benefit, but simply have agencies to look after them and visit their little villages from time to time, I must say I see no reason why an agency should exist there at all. This agency is 12 miles off from the nearest pueblo. They are scattered all over that section of country of which Santa Fé is the center. I think the appropriation is not required. We have there a military post; yet we rent buildings for the agency, we necessarily employ a clerk, and of course incur other incidental expenses connected with the agency.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a single word supplementary to what the gentleman from Indiana has just said. I have no doubt, having had, I believe, substantially the same means of information by observation and otherwise that the gentleman from Indiana had—I have no doubt that this appropriation can be stricken out without doing the public service any harm. As the gentleman from Indiana has said, the Pueblo Indians in New Mexico are in that condition that they require no agent. They require no attention at the hands of the Government. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to strike out that appropriation.

Mr. MORRISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw it that the gentleman from Illinois may renew it.

Mr. MORRISON. I renew the amendment. If this agency is useless and can be dispensed with, it may be done by striking out the appropriation and refusing to appropriate for it. Then it will be competent and legal for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to dispense with the services or agency not appropriated for. In this way, and under the rules as they are, all unnecessary agents may be dismissed and the cost of the service reduced to its actual needs. It would be the duty of the Commissioner to so reduce it.

The fault of the committee which has reported this bill and this item to continue this agency, if it has committed any fault at all, seems to be that it had too much respect and admiration for the action of its predecessors on the Appropriations Committee in framing Indian appropriation bills. I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas who reports this bill has followed exactly in the footsteps of his predecessor, and has appropriated for all the agents that have been heretofore and were last year appropriated for by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Naturally enough we might all of us believe that what the gentleman from Indiana, with his long experience and his well-known character for economy, found it necessary to appropriate for this agency last year might rightly be repeated this year. No one knows better than the gentleman from Indiana how to rid the public service of useless officers or agents, through a bill for the purpose, whenever he desires so to do. He is too old and experienced a legislator to undertake to convince this legislative body that it can not rid itself of unnecessary officers or expenditures because it may not legislate on appropriation bills. None of us will be freed from the responsibility of extravagant appropriations by hiding behind the rules of this year or the last, when the appropriation was the same under the old rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I took occasion to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the appropriation was not made the office would be abolished.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. The pending motion is to strike out lines 73 and 74, as follows: "At the Pueblo agency, $1,800." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] states that there is no necessity for an agency for the Pueblo Indians. In one respect there is no necessity; that is to say, we do not pay those Indians any annuities, and that part of the duty of an Indian agent is not required as to the Pueblo Indians. But gentlemen who understand the condition of the tribes in New Mexico and Arizona will remember that there are many other matters in which they are deeply interested in connection with the General Government that an agent ought to look after. In the Territory of New Mexico the Pueblos are settled upon reservations ceded to them by the United States, which are on an average about 17,000 acres in extent. The Indians held those lands in common, cultivating a portion of them and using the other portions for pasturage.

It is well known to those who have visited that part of the country that there are continual depredations upon the Indian lands by white settlers. The white men are always endeavoring to get leases from the Indians or to make contracts with them, greatly to their detriment and frequently to their oppression and outrage. It is known that there is a trading post at each of the agencies, or at least at many of them, and that these trading posts bring upon the reservations a great number of white people, and the controversies that are continually arising between the Indian on the one hand and the whites upon the other require the attention of an agent of the United States Government, who in all these cases will act as an umpire, as a judge, as a friend of the Indian, and for the Government of the United States, in protecting the Indians in their rights.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede that occasionally such a necessity as the gentleman describes arises for the presence of an officer representing the United States Government. But, in the first place, are not those Indians about as intelligent as the Mexican population generally of that part of the country? Do they not live and carry on their farming in about the same manner? And, secondly, are not those Indians in a condition to be properly protected wherever protection is required by the ten agents of the Indian Bureau, the five inspectors, and the five special agents? Are not the duties which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] describes just the duties which ought to devolve upon those ten agents? When you consider the limited number of agencies in the United States, only sixty in all, and remember the Government has these ten agents with appropriations for traveling expenses, it seems to me that we have all the agents that are necessary to look after such matters as those to which my friend from Illinois refers.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is very true, Mr. Chairman, so far as the general business of the Department is concerned; but the gentleman knows that those agents are subject to the orders of the Department, are constantly going from one place to another, and are seldom more than a few days at any one place. On the other hand, these difficulties between the Indians and the whites are continually arising, and require prompt attention. Furthermore, these Department agents do not speak Spanish, the only language in which they could hold communication with the Pueblo Indians.

The next provision in the bill is for the agent at the Navajo agency. If we are to strike out this appropriation for the Pueblo agency because we do not pay the Pueblos annuities, the item for the agents for the Navajoes ought to be struck out also, because we do not pay them any annuities. The Navajoes are a very rich tribe. They have a vast amount of pasture land, and they are continually getting into trouble with the settlers, and it is necessary that an agent should be constantly on hand for the purpose of preventing difficulty.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will ask him whether the duty of the agent for the Pueblos does not largely consist in protecting them from trespassers?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly. In that respect the duties of that agent are precisely similar to the duties of the other Indian agents. The only respect in which the duties of the Pueblo agent differs from those of other agents is in the fact that he has no annuities to pay, and that is the smallest part of the duties of any agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to strike out lines 73 and 74.

Mr. MORRISON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the motion. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] would, under other circumstances, have a great deal of force, because these Pueblo Indians, although self-supporting, do, probably, require some care; but I do not see what these ten special agents are employed for, unless it is to perform just such duties. This reservation is small, the Indians are engaged largely in agriculture and are entirely self-supporting, and have been so ever since we have owned that Territory. As gentlemen are aware, they are citizens under the treaties by which we acquired that region of country.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment will not prevail. There is no doubt that the services of agents on these reservations are necessary, and to send out a special agent from the Indian Office here would cost immeasurably more than the salary of the local agent.

The House divided on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to strike out lines 73 and 74; and there were—ayes 43, noes 69.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the Quapaw agency, $1,500.

Mr. RYAN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to the paragraph just read. In the law for the current year it was provided, I believe, that not more than $1,200 of any moneys appropriated by the act should be expended for clerical labor at this agency. I wish to inquire why this limitation has been stricken off in this bill.

Mr. WELLBORN. It appeared to the Committee on Indian Affairs that the limitation to which the gentleman refers in the bill of last session was an exception to the rule in regard to all the other agencies. On inquiry I could find no satisfactory reason for the continuance of the limitation; and in order to preserve the harmony of the bill I struck it out. If there be any reason why the limitation should be continued, I would be glad to hear the gentleman state it.

Mr. RYAN. My recollection is that the limitation was inserted last year because a much larger sum had been expended at that agency and the expenditure was believed to be unnecessary. The agency is a small one, and it was thought that an expenditure of $1,200 at that agency for clerical services was sufficient. If the limitation is now struck out it would seem to be a sort of suggestion to those who have the management or control there that they may use a much larger sum for clerical services. It seems to me the limitation was wise in view of the fact that a much larger sum was expended for clerical services at that place and the expenditure was believed to be unnecessary.

Mr. WELLBORN. The gentleman means there had been such unnecessary expenditure prior to last year?

Mr. RYAN. I think so.

Mr. WELLBORN. Does the gentleman make any proposition in reference to the matter?

Mr. RYAN. I suggest an amendment.

Mr. WELLBORN. I have no authority from the committee to accept the amendment, but for myself I can say that I am perfectly indiferent in the matter, and that if there be any reason for inserting such a limitation in this bill I have no objection to its insertion.

Mr. RYAN. Then I move to amend by adding to this paragraph these words: "And not more than $1,200 of any moneys appropriated by this act shall be expended for clerical labor at this agency."

Mr. REAGAN. Is there any reason to believe that so much as $1,200 will be needed?

Mr. RYAN. I can not give any assurance that $1,200 will be absolutely required; but I have no doubt some clerical force is necessary at that agency. This is simply suggested as a limitation. It is supposed that $1,200 will be ample.

The amendment of Mr. RYAN was adopted.

Mr. WELLBORN. I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that we should make greater progress in this bill to-day than has been made. But I find, from evidences around me, that members are becoming somewhat impatient, and in deference to their wishes I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BEACH. I shall object.

Mr. LONG. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR: Petition of Richard Anderson for $60 due him as lamp-lighter in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SCRANTON: Of citizens of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. WHITING: Of citizens of Worcester and Hampshire Counties, Massachusetts.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury as to the necessity of special appropriations for alterations and repairs to certain public buildings, and also as to the need of a deficiency appropriation for repairs and preservation of public buildings for 1886; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a letter from the president of the board of trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, stating that at a meeting of the board of trustees it was thought advisable that the Senate bill relating to the Reform School should be so amended as to receive into it boys under the age of sixteen years; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents resolutions of the senate and house of delegates of Virginia, which, though not under seal, seem to be signed, and will be read.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the senate of Virginia that the proposition now pending in the Congress of the United States to place foreign iron ores on the free-list is unwise, and, if adopted, will greatly injure the iron interests of this State and retard the development of the same.

Passed the senate March 1, 1886.

J. D. PENDLETON, C. S.

Resolved, That it is the sense of the house of delegates of Virginia that the proposition now pending in the Congress of the United States to place foreign iron ores on the free-list is unwise, and, if adopted, will greatly injure the iron interests of this State and retard the development of the same.

Agreed to by house of delegates of Virginia (yeas 48, nays 14) March 1, 1886.

J. BELL BIGGER, C. H. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Athens and Kent, in the State of Ohio, praying for liberal appropriations for the construction of works of internal improvement and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Freehold Local Assembly, No. 2161, Knights of Labor, of Kent, Ohio, praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of 19 clergymen, 16 physicians, 37 lawyers, 34 teachers, 160 business men, and 8 officers of temperance and other societies, of Wyandott, Highland, and Brown Counties, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAWYER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Marinette and Whitewater, Wis., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition of the Knights of Labor, Local Assembly No. 2692, of Springfield, Mass., praying that the usual annual appropriation of $400,000 for the purpose of the manufacture of arms at the Springfield armory be not reduced, and expressing the opinion that it is false economy and a cruel policy to cut down the appropriation and thereby augment existing distress and suffering, and that to continue this uniform appropriation will promote true economy, inasmuch as it will continue the production of arms at a reasonable price and keep together the present organization of skilled workmen, enabling the Government in case of war to at once make its own arms.

I trust that these reasons will commend themselves to the Committee on Appropriations. They express my views heartily. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of 20 clergymen, 21 physicians, 10 sawyers, 38 teachers, 138 business men, and 64 officers of temperance and other societies of Worcester and other counties in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BERRY presented a petition of 244 resident citizens of Hot Springs, Ark., praying legislation to protect the Government structures upon the Hot Springs reservation, and also, for the interest and convenience of visitors and the local community, to provide for the removal within a reasonable time of all the structures on the reservation that are occupied by private individuals. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of the District Assembly No. 107, Knights of Labor, of the State of Missouri, signed by Irwin C. Goodenough, district M. W., and Frank G. Ells, district R. S., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of public improvement of national importance, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a petition of the Alliance of Ladies organized for the promotion of social purity, and composed of delegates appointed by the pastors of the several religious denominations of Washington city and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia earnestly praying for the passage of the bill introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] providing for the legal protection of young girls in the District of Columbia. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of Knights of Labor of South Norwalk, Conn., and a petition of Knights of Labor of Bridgeport, Conn., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement of national importance, and especially for the speedy construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of certain postmasters of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 318) to authorize the readjustment of the compensation of postmasters at certain fourth-class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 3202, Knights of Labor, of Paxton, Pa., praying for the construction of works of internal improvement, and especially of the Hennepin Canal, by the General Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 55 citizens of Cochranville, Chester County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of 28 other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a bill prohibiting the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of 143 citizens of Kennett Square, Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a law prohibiting the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of 143 citizens of Kennett Square, Chester County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of 55 citizens of Cochranville, Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of 55 citizens of Cochranville, Chester County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of 143 citizens of Kennett Square, Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment to the Constitution which will prohibit henceforth the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of citizens of Fort Worth, Tex., praying for the erection at that place of a building to be used as a post-office and for internal-revenue and other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Austin, Travis County, Texas, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PAYNE presented a petition of 17 clergymen, 11 physicians, 1 lawyer, 27 teachers, 88 business men, and 59 officers of temperance and other societies, of Lucas and Ottawa Counties, Ohio, and a petition of citizens of New London, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Clay County, Indiana, praying that liberal appropriations be made for public works, and especially for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of John M. Cannady and 164 other citizens of Idaho Territory, remonstrating against the passage of any bill for the division of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of 10 clergymen, 13 physicians, 14 lawyers, 14 teachers, 102 business men, and 29 officers of temperance and other societies of Waldo and Somerset Counties, Maine, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONGER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Essexville and Flint, in the State of Michigan, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PALMER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Bay City, Otisville, and Ingersoll, in the State of Michigan, praying Congress to relieve the present distress of the laboring classes by liberal appropriations for public works of national importance; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Griffith & Co., James Wood, and 112 other merchants of New York, praying that Congress authorize the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for improving Harlem River, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial of Local Assembly No. 457, Knights of Labor, of Jefferson County, New York, favoring a liberal appropriation for internal improvements, and especially the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 31 clergymen, 24 physicians, 13 lawyers, 35 teachers, 138 business men, and 41 officers of temperance and other societies of Cattaraugus, Chautauqua, and Allegany Counties, New York, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 148) for the relief of the heirs of Charles B. Smith, deceased, late a lieutenant in the Fifth Iowa Cavalry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of William P. Chambliss, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHACE introduced a bill (S. 1908) to amend section 4004 of the Revised Statutes providing for additional pay for postal cars; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. EVARTS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1909) for the relief of W. H. Ward; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1910) to provide for the erection of a building for marine barracks at the navy-yard at Pensacola, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TELLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1911) relating to procedure in pension cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1912) granting certain lands to the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1913) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1914) to incorporate the National Light and Fuel Company; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say one word with regard to this bill. I do not know any of the gentlemen who are named in the bill as incorporators, and there are some amendments which I should desire to see incorporated in the bill; but I introduce it because I believe that something should be done to provide the District of Columbia with a better service of light than it has at the present time. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1915) for the relief of Mrs. Clara Morris; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the especial attention of the Committee on Claims to this case. That committee has already once considered it, but only upon partial evidence. Much additional evidence has been obtained, which I now present to accompany the bill, and I have become profoundly convinced from a careful examination of it that this lady ought to have her pay. I ask that the Committee on Claims examine the evidence carefully. This lady, whom we see here in the Capitol, the evidence shows, rendered valuable service to the Government during the war at great personal risk. A considerable amount of furniture owned by her had been appropriated by the Government for the use of freedmen who were in the charge of the Government, in occupation thereof by the Government, and the furniture was destroyed while so used, amounting to $3,000 or $4,000, and she never has been able to get compensation for it. I think from the additional testimony the justice of her claim will be very apparent.

I move that the bill with the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Alexander Moseley be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

BINDING OF CENSUS SCHEDULES.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to have bound, at the Government Printing Office, the schedules of the Second, Third, Fourth, and Tenth Censuses of the United States.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions the morning business is closed, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar!

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to call up the motion that I made yesterday to make the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce a special order for Tuesday, March 30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bill named by him be made a special order for Tuesday, March 30, at 2 p. m.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that is done I desire to report from the Committee on Appropriations the urgency deficiency bill and to ask for its immediate consideration. I think it will take but a few moments to dispose of it, and it is very important that the bill should be returned to the other House to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think there will be any objection to my motion; and I wish to get it out of the way. It is merely to set down the bill for consideration on the 30th of March.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I am at the mercy of Senators. It requires unanimous consent to consider the appropriation bill to-day, which I desire to secure.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think there will be any objection to considering the appropriation bill, nor do I think there will be any objection to the motion I make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion made by him in respect to the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce. He moves that it be made the special order for Tuesday, March 30, at 2 o'clock p. m. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I now call up a similar motion which I made at the same time in regard to the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. PLATT. I intended to make objection, at least temporarily, to the motion of the Senator from Illinois. I did not understand that an objection was called for to the motion, but to the consideration of the motion at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not too late for the Senator to interpose.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say a word on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is in time.

Mr. PLATT. I do not object absolutely to the making of this special assignment, but I think I ought to say that I feel I am entitled to have considered immediately after the present unfinished business the bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State. That bill was before the Senate at the last Congress, and I gave way to other matters supposed to be of pressing importance. It has been for a long time before the Senate on the Calendar, has been passed over on the Calendar, and I have felt that I was entitled to its consideration at various times; but I have given way because it was supposed that matters of more pressing importance should come first.

I think there is no measure before the Senate of more importance than this. I do not suppose that the special order which is asked for will be likely to interfere with the consideration which I desire that bill shall receive, and therefore I make no objection to this order further than to state that if it should interfere with the motion which I propose to make to take up the Washington bill immediately after the present unfinished business is completed I shall at that time feel as if I ought to antagonize it.

Mr. CULLOM. Let me say one word. I have not understood or believed that the order I have asked for will interfere at all with the desire of the Senator from Connecticut to consider the bill to which he refers, and I hope under the circumstances, as that Senator has been detained from the Senate unavoidably for a few days, that he will be allowed to call up the bill immediately on the conclusion of the pending business if he desires to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order asked for by the Senator from Illinois will be entered. The Chair hears no objection.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HOAR. I now call up the motion which I made to fix the bankruptcy bill for the day next after the bill of the Senator from Illinois, Wednesday, March 31. As I stated yesterday, I shall not antagonize the bill which the Senator from Illinois has in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts, in pursuance of notice, moves that the bill (S. 714) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States be made a special order for Wednesday, March 31, 1886, at 2 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. TELLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will submit the question to the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts having introduced the motion yesterday. The question is on making the bankruptcy bill a special order at the time stated. [Putting the question.] Two-thirds being required, the Chair is not able to announce the result.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays. I desire to say that I shall not antagonize the matter of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] or that of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I merely want to have the bankruptcy bill set down in its order.

Mr. FRYE. I did not make any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If authorized, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAWES. I am paired for the day with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I am informed that he would vote in the affirmative, and with that understanding it is that I have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BUTLER. My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] has been called home by illness in his family. He begged me to pair him in case of any yea-and-nay vote, but this not being a political question I have not thought it necessary to do so, but simply to explain why he is not here to vote.

Mr. MORRILL (after having voted in the affirmative). At the moment my name was called I voted, forgetting that I am paired for an hour or two with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I withdraw my vote. I do not know how the Senator from Tennessee would vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is necessarily detained from the Senate Chamber by illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who is not present. My colleague would vote "nay" if he were here and not paired.

Mr. PALMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I was not aware when I voted that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is absent this morning. I am paired with him, and withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 14; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in favor of the motion, it is carried.

URGENT DEFCIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I now report from the Committee on Appropriations the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and I ask for present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks for the present consideration of the amendments to this bill. The Chair hears no objection, and they are before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate inserted on page 2 of the bill an item of $30,000 for the funeral expenses of General Grant. The House of Representatives concurred in that amendment with an amendment which is found on page 5 of the last print of the bill, and which I ask the Secretary to read. I will say, however, before it is read, that the Senate Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment the House propose to insert the following:

To reimburse the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department of the Army for expenses attending the funeral of General Grant, paid by authority of executive order directing General Hancock to give General Grant an imposing funeral, $12,037.93.

To pay the three items of expense referred by General Hancock to the Secretary of War, namely: For hire of stenographer, $195; telegrams received and sent, $452.83; mileage expenses, $353.68; in all, $1,001.51, or so much thereof as the Secretary of War may find to be due and unpaid.

To pay the bill of Stephen Merritt, undertaker, for embalming, burial casket, and ornamentation thereof, canopy, catafalque, and other necessary articles and services furnished by him at reasonable prices, and which remain unpaid, $6,303.75, or so much thereof as may be necessary and found upon examination by the Secretary of War to be just and proper charges.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the amendment is agreed to, I desire to say that the Senate Committee on Appropriations and the Senate found this clause for the funeral expenses of General Grant in the deficiency estimates and placed at $30,000. It seems on an examination of the papers in detail that some of the items may be regarded as irregular. General Hancock, who had charge of the funeral, recommended the absolute payment of certain of these expenses, and some of them were actually paid out of the regular appropriations for the Army. There were, however, incurred in addition to these expenses some $11,000 that do not seem to have had the approval of General Hancock. In order that the Senate may be put in possession of the circumstances which led to the estimate of the Secretary of War I ask that the letter which I send to the desk, with the indorsements thereon, may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 3, 1885.

GENERAL: I have the honor herewith to return the vouchers and accounts in the matter of the expenditures for the funeral of General U. S. Grant, United States Army, retired.

As Major-General Hancock was authorized to do whatever was necessary and proper for the purpose of burying General Grant with imposing military ceremonies, it is recommended to the honorable the Secretary of War that the vouchers covering the expenditures made under his direction be paid from the current appropriations as classified in the accompanying estimate of funds, on the ground that such payments are expected by the creditors and appear to be warranted by the instructions given General Hancock. Of the sums required for this purpose $5,480.92 can not be spared from the appropriation for incidental expenses without seriously crippling the service of the Army for the entire year. On this account it is further recommended that the amount required to make this sum good to the appropriation for the current year be reported to Congress as a deficiency for this year.

The expenditures made for the funeral, for which accounts are here presented, not directly authorized and directed by Major-General Hancock ought to be paid when an appropriation shall be made by Congress for the purpose; and it is also recommended that an estimate be made and presented to Congress, asking for this additional sum in the usual deficiency bill for the purpose indicated.

If so directed the proper estimates covering all necessary expenditures will be prepared in this office and presented to the honorable Secretary of War for his action.

It should be remembered that in the opinion of this office the bills presented by the undertaker should be carefully and critically examined and duly audited by the paying officer before final payment.

The approved bills for $12,037.93 belong to appropriations as follows:

Incidental expenses	$5,480 92
Army transportation	6,525 51
Barracks and quarters	31 50
	12,037 93

Amount of bills which have not been approved by General Hancock, $15,195.05. Of this sum $6,303.75 belong to the bills presented by the undertaker.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. HOLABIRD,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

To the ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
United States Army.

Quartermaster-General, November 3, 1885, returns the vouchers and accounts in connection with the expenditures for the funeral of the late General U. S. Grant.

As General Hancock was authorized to do what was necessary and proper, recommends that the vouchers made under his direction be paid, and that the matter be reported to Congress as a deficiency this year.

Also makes suggestions in regard to the payment of the accounts not directly authorized and directed by General Hancock.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 26, 1885.

Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General for payment of the vouchers approved by General Hancock, after action has been taken as suggested in the fourth paragraph of this letter.

The Quartermaster-General will also prepare the proper estimates for submission to Congress.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War with special estimate for $27,388.03.

I have the honor to recommend that Congress be asked for appropriation.

It is suggested that the estimate be made for $29,684.03, which amount would include the $1,001.51 paid by the Pay Department, and $1,294.49 paid by the Subsistence Department.

Upon reconsideration it is deemed best to ask for a special appropriation to be designated "funeral expenses of General U. S. Grant," from which the entire cost of the obsequies may be paid and expenditures from appropriations for this or other Departments made before the granting of this appropriation reimbursed.

S. B. HOLABIRD,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, January 2, 1886.

Request for remittance of the following sums to chief quartermaster's division of the Atlantic to pay authorized expenditures has been made.

January 4, 1886, namely:

Incidental expenses	$5,480 92
Barracks and quarters	31 50
Army transportation	6,525 51
Total	$12,037 93

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 15, 1886.

Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General, an estimate for the amount ($30,000) having been submitted to Congress. See page 15 of House Executive Document No. 62, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

By order of the Secretary of War.

JOHN TWEEDALE,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be seen from these papers that the expenditures directly incurred by General Hancock are provided for in the amendment suggested by the House of Representatives. Certain other expenses were incurred by State and municipal authority for which bills have been filed in the War Department, and the Quartermaster-General and Secretary of War have recommended their payment; but the House of Representatives after consideration seems to be of the opinion that these expenses ought not to be included in this urgent deficiency bill, and the Senate committee recommend a concurrence in that view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The next amendment, No. 2, the House disagreed to on the ground that it is not an urgent deficiency. I desire to put in the RECORD a telegram received by our committee from the Secretary of War respecting this appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1886.

To Hon. W. B. ALLISON, Senate:

The item $18,350 for the cable at Block Island is necessary and should be included in the urgent deficiency bill. Any statement to the contrary must have been made without a full knowledge of the subject.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations concur in that statement made by the Secretary of War, and therefore recommend that the Senate insist on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate insist on its second amendment. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amendment No. 2, made by the Senate, was, under the head of "War Department," after line 37, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of War to lay a new submarine cable, Block Island Bay, fiscal year 1886, $18,350.

The motion to insist was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The House of Representatives agreed to amendment No. 5 with an amendment. The Senate Committee on Appropriations recommend that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the House of Representatives to the fifth amendment of the Senate is to add:

Water supply, District of Columbia:

The sum of $5,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of War to preserve from flooding or other injury during the suspension of operations thereon the tunnel now being constructed under authority of an act to increase the water-supply of Washington city, and for other purposes, approved July 15, 1882; the said sum to be subject to all the provisions and restrictions of said act and of the act approved July 5, 1884, making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia as to its apportionment and settlement between the United States and the District of Columbia, and the refunding thereof.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations recommend that the Senate insist upon its sixth amendment, being an item of $260 for the repair of the water-tank on the main building of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum, and I desire that the letter of the surgeon-in-chief of this hospital, the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, and the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury may be read in the order which I have named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

FREEDMEN'S HOSPITAL,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1886.

SIR: The tank on the main hospital building, which has a capacity of 3,000 gallons, has suddenly commenced to leak. On examination, I find that the lining is so decayed that it can not be repaired. It is important that it be relined at once, as otherwise the hospital will be without water. The present lining is lead. I desire to replace it by iron, as the lead is more perishable, and there is also danger of poison. A careful estimate has been made, and it will cost $260.

I would like an item inserted in the emergency deficiency bill covering this demand.

Very respectfully,

C. B. PURVIS, M. D.,
Surgeon-in-Chief.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 20, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the surgeon-in-chief of Freedmen's Hospital, submitting an estimate of $260 for repairs of water-tank on the main hospital building, and requesting that it be included in the emergency deficiency bill.

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 25, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, an estimate for an appropriation of $260 to repair the water-tank on the main building of the Freedmen's Hospital, Washington, D. C., submitted by the Secretary of the Interior with the request that it may be inserted in the emergency deficiency bill for immediate use.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

The Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be seen from this printed document that the surgeon-in-chief, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Treasury recommend that this item be inserted in this bill. The House of Representatives seems to have been without information on this subject. The Committee on Appropriations recommend that the Senate insist on its amendment.

The motion to insist was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. There is still another amendment, No. 7. I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read Senate amendment No. 7, as follows:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1886, $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. There seems to have been no information furnished to the Committee on Appropriations elsewhere with reference to this item. I will say that it is not usual to furnish detailed statements to the House of expenditures in the Senate or to the Senate of expenditures in the House. It is usually understood that these two bodies are able to regulate and control their contingent expenses, although information, I believe, is always open with reference to the expenditures of the contingent fund of the Senate. I will only add that the Senate is perfectly familiar with the fact that this item is necessary. I move, therefore, that the Senate insist on this amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments to the bill are now disposed of. The Calendar is in order.

BRIDGES OVER WILLAMETTE RIVER.

Mr. DOLPH. We have reached the Calendar now. There is upon the Calendar Order of Business 300, a bridge bill which passed the Senate at the last session and has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce precisely as it passed the Senate. I think it will take no time, and I move to take it up for consideration.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator will let us have the Calendar. It has been so long since we have seen the Calendar that it does one good to have it reached.

Mr. DOLPH. The result will be that we shall get hold of one of the bills providing for the payment of some claim that is purely private, the discussion of which will occupy the whole morning hour, and then we shall not go to the Calendar again for a month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that debate is not in order on this motion. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 901) to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 11.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask that the question be stated again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DAWES. If there is any special reason for taking up this bill out of order——

Mr. DOLPH. There is a special reason. It is a local matter, which will take but a moment. There will be no discussion.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us hear the title of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read again.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 901) to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question and request Senators to vote one way or the other.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I have no knowledge of this bill and no disposition to throw any obstacle in its way; but I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the indefiniteness of the first section and suggest to him the propriety of making it a little more definite. As I understand the section, this railroad company can build bridges anywhere it pleases in Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. "South of Oregon City," it says; but as to all the bridges to be built the plan and location must be submitted to the Secretary of War. In fact, here all that will be needed will be one bridge across the Willamette River. The bill was submitted at the last session of Congress to the Secretary of War and the local engineers in charge of the Government works and reported upon. It has been again submitted this Congress to the Secretary of War and reported upon. It was examined by the Committee on Commerce at both sessions. It passed the Senate at the last session, precisely the same bill, word for word.

Mr. DAWES. That may be a reason why I should not have made such an inquiry, but it might not be a reason why somebody ought not to have made the inquiry. Will the Senator point out where the Secretary of War is authorized to locate the bridge? If that is so, that will satisfy my inquiry. It may be so; I have not followed the bill quite close enough to see. If there is any effect to be given to the language of the first section of this bill it is the railroad company, not the Secretary of War, that is to locate, for it says——

Mr. DOLPH. In section 3, about the middle of the page, I think the Senator will find it.

Mr. DAWES. I will read what troubles me:

That the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of Oregon, be authorized and permitted to build railroad bridges across the Willamette River, south of Oregon City, at such point as it may select—

"It," not the Secretary of War, is to locate the bridge "at such point as it may select." I do not know but that is satisfactory to the people of Oregon, but I should not like to have such an authority as that let loose in Massachusetts. Then it goes on and says—and across such other navigable streams or sloughs within the State of Oregon as it may be necessary to bridge along the line of said railroad or along the line of any of its branches.

The other bridges are to be along the line of the railroad, but this first bridge is anywhere the company pleases on this particular river except that it be south of Oregon City. I would suggest to the Senator that he make that subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will look at section 3, line 11, on page 3 of the bill, he will find:

Said bridge or bridges shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of navigable rivers or sloughs as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of any such bridge, and a map of the location, giving for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river or slough, &c.

So far as a bridge as distinct from the line of the railroad is concerned that is not contemplated for a moment, nor do I think it could be built under this bill. This is a railroad company, building a line from Winnemucca to Astoria. In doing so they will necessarily cross Willamette River. They propose to cross above Oregon City, where there is an obstruction to navigation. They are to either build a bridge so high that all the commerce of the river can pass under it, or they are to build a draw-bridge at a point to be approved by the Secretary of War, constructed according to a plan to be approved by the Secretary of War, under directions to be approved by the Secretary of War, and when they have built it the Secretary of War has power to require them to change it at any time and every year after it is built at their own expense, and Congress can amend or repeal the bill at any time. If there ever was a bridge bill guarded——

Mr. DAWES. This is as to everything except the location.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the question of location is well covered. If not, I would not ask the Senate to pass the bill myself. I am not afraid of anything being let loose on Oregon.

Mr. CONGER. I may say that as far as it was possible for the Committee on Commerce to define the safeguards and localities, it has been done in this bill as in others; but in that country it is uncertain at what point the necessities of engineering may require the road to cross the Willamette River, owing to the hilly country. I think I am very particular as to obstruction to navigation, and I am sure the bill contains all the safeguards that will be necessary for the navigation of that stream above where it is usually navigable now.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGES IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. CULLOM. There is just one other bridge bill on the Calendar, Order of Business 301, which passed the Senate last year and which has been scrutinized by the War Department two or three times. I ask that that be put on its passage also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 236) to authorize the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges in the Territory of Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 11, section 1, to strike out the words "or hereafter," before the word "projected;" so as to read:

That the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of Washington Territory, its successors or assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate bridges, and approaches thereto, over the Nooksack River, in the county of Whatcom, the Skagit River, in the county of Skagit, and the Stillaquamish and Snohomish Rivers, in the county of Snohomish, at the points where the said company's lines of railways, as now projected, cross said rivers respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 17, after the word "persons," to strike out "owning" and insert "controlling;" so as to read:

And the authority to erect and continue any and all said bridges shall be subject to revocation by law whenever the public good shall, in the judgment of Congress, so require; and all such structures shall, upon such revocation, be removed, at the expense of the owners thereof, or the persons controlling and operating the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 182, Order of Business 154. It is the bill to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic. It has been passed by the Senate five times already, and is in a condition where it will go through without discussion, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the considerarion of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 182) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 239, being the bill (S. 1471) to remove the charge of desertion from the rolls and records in the Office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against certain soldiers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the words "forever barred" be stricken out of the bill, leaving the other limitation as it is, which I think will accomplish the purpose just as well as the absolute bar.

Mr. LOGAN. Declaring it forever barred would not prevent its being passed on by Congress again. It is a mere declaration.

Mr. CONGER. But there is no necessity for these words to effect the object of the bill. The limitations are sufficient without it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "years," at the end of line 4 of section 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "shall be forever barred and;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That all applications for relief under this act shall be made to and filed with the Secretary of War within a period of five years from and after its passage, and all applications not so made and filed within such period of five years shall not be received or considered; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CONGER. That is sufficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to take up Senate bill 1405, in reference to scientific temperance education.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1405) to provide for the study of the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics, and of their effects upon the human system, in connection with the several divisions of the subject of physiology and hygiene, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and the District of Columbia, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and Indian and colored schools in the Territories of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Section 4 should be stricken out. The bill will take effect on its passage whether that section is in or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out section 4 of the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect on its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. If there is any report, I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR February 8, 1886, as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred Senate bill 797, entitled "A bill to provide for the study of physiology and hygiene, and the effect of intoxicating, narcotic, and poisonous substances upon life, health, and welfare, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and of the District of Columbia, and in the Military and Naval Academies," have considered the same, and report a new bill, in the nature of a substitute for the original bill, and recommend its passage, and that the original bill be indefinitely postponed.

This measure is an attempt to apply to the schools within Federal control, and where the Congress is primarily responsible for the proper education of the youth, the provisions of laws now in active operation in fourteen States, to wit, Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Kansas, Nebraska, Oregon, Alabama, Nevada, Rhode Island, also Washington Territory, and in all of which such laws were enacted without opposition from any political party and generally, if not always, with great unanimity on the part of the legislative power.

This bill is one against which it is difficult, not to say unnatural, to urge an objection. It seems to command the spontaneous and earnest support of every man who does not hate children and seek an opportunity to transmit misery to posterity. Its only object is to give to the rising and coming generations accurate and scientific knowledge of certain substances which are sure to be dangerous to their welfare if the temptations which they present are encountered in ignorance of their true nature.

Not a single suggestion has been developed in the deliberations of your committee which was not made to perfect the bill so far as possible, and to secure with the more certainty its wise and benevolent purposes.

In reporting this bill favorably, and earnestly recommending its passage, your committee discharge a grateful duty with a sincere pleasure, which is enhanced by the unanimity of their action. The stenographic report of the eloquent and powerful addresses delivered before the committee in support of the bill are thought to be of such value as to demand their preservation. They will be found appended to this report, the brevity of which is justified by their conclusive force.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas ask for the reading of the appendix?

The Secretary proceeded to read "Appendix—Temperance education bill."

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the reading of the appendix be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). If there be no objection the reading of the appendix will be waived.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 777, Calendar No. 171.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after "shall," to insert "from and after July 1, 1886;" in line 5, after "quartermaster," to strike out "and commissary;" in line 6, after "sergeants," to insert "of cavalry, artillery, and infantry;" in line 11, after "cavalry," to insert "and light;" in the same line, after "artillery," to insert "and infantry;" in line 12, after "dollars," to strike out "corporals of artillery and infantry, $18;" in the beginning of line 13, to insert "saddler-sergeants of cavalry, $22;" in line 14, before "blacksmiths," to insert "artificers;" at the end of line 15, to insert "wagoners, $17;" in line 16, after "trumpeters," to strike out "of cavalry;" in line 18, after "dollars," to insert "hospital stewards, $40 for first-class, $30 for second-class;" in line 20, after "dollars," to insert "post quartermaster-sergeants and commissary-sergeants, $34;" in line 27, after "engineers," to insert "and ordnance;" in line 28, after "engineers," to insert "and ordnance;" in line 30, after "service," to insert "on the active-list;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the monthly pay of the following enlisted men of the Army shall, from and after July 1, 1886, during their first term of enlistment, be as follows: Sergeant-majors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $26; quartermaster-sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $23; chief trumpeters of cavalry, $22; principal musicians of artillery and infantry, $22; first sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $24; sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $20; corporals of cavalry and infantry, $18; saddler-sergeants of cavalry, $22; saddlers of cavalry, $18; artificers, blacksmiths, and farriers of cavalry, $18; wagoners, $17; trumpeters, $16; musicians of artillery and infantry, $16; privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $16; hospital-stewards, $40 for first class, $30 for second class; ordnance-sergeants of posts, $34; post quartermaster-sergeants and commissary-sergeants, $34; sergeant-majors of engineers, $36; quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, $36; sergeants of engineers and ordnance, $34; corporals of engineers and ordnance, $23; musicians of engineers, $16; privates (first class) of engineers and ordnance, $18; privates (second class) of engineers and ordnance, $16; and said rates of pay hereby established shall be increased for continued service on the active-list, as provided by sections 1281, 1282, 1283, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to add to section 3 the following proviso:

Provided, That the pay of a retired enlisted man shall be three-fourths of the pay of his rank under this section at date of retirement and $8 per month in lieu of allowances.

Mr. LOGAN. After asking the Paymaster-General to make computation in reference to that, he informed me it would approach $9. So I think it would be fairer to insert "nine" instead of "eight." I move to so amend the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator from Illinois if there is any objection, before the amendments reported by the committee are further taken up to my making a motion to strike out section 2, as I shall be called from the Senate in a few moments.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to the motion being entertained.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read for information.

The Secretary read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the number of enlisted men in the Army, including an engineer battalion of five hundred and twenty men, hospital stewards, and one thousand Indian scouts, be, and hereby is, established as a force not to exceed thirty thousand men.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to say to the Senator from Maine that it is my purpose to move an amendment to section 2 in the proper order, after the amendments proposed by the committee shall have been acted on; that is, to insert substantially the infantry battalion bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senators that if they will let us get through with the amendments already proposed to the bill by the committee, then I will not object to going back and having amendments offered to any section.

Mr. HALE. My reason for making the request was that I shall not be in the Senate after a little while; but if the bill is to go over, as I suppose it will at 2 o'clock——

Mr. LOGAN. I will consider the amendment as offered.

Mr. HALE. Evidently the bill can not be completed to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to have the amendments of the committee acted on, and then I shall not object to any amendment being offered.

Mr. PLATT. I am glad to have the Senator from Maine withdraw his proposed amendment at this time, because when that section is considered I desire to move to make the Army under this bill 50,000 instead of 30,000.

Mr. HALE. My object is precisely the reverse. I do not think the Army ought to be increased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine having withdrawn his amendment, the amendments of the committee will be reported in their order.

The next amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs was, in section 4, line 5, after the words "and that the," to strike out "pay proper of such soldier" and insert "sum of $20 per month;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That officers of the Army stationed at military posts apart from settlements may, with the approval of the department commander, each employ one private soldier as a servant: Provided, That the consent of such soldier shall be first procured, and that the sum of $20 per month during the period of such employment shall be charged against the officer employing him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That the officer detailed to duty as the governor of the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., shall have the local rank of colonel, with the pay and allowances of said grade while on said duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, as section 7:

That the pay of chaplain shall be, from the 1st of July next, $1,800 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 1, after the word "line," to insert "except regimental quartermasters;" in line 3, after the word "compensation," to strike out "($10 per month);" and in line 4, after the word "acting," to strike out "assistant;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That officers of the line, except regimental quartermasters, detailed for duty as acting assistant quartermasters, shall be allowed the same additional compensation as is now allowed by law to acting commissaries of subsistence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13, line 2, after the words "enlistment of," to strike out "one hundred and fifty;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to cause the enlistment of competent instructors for post schools, who shall have the rank and pay of commissary-sergeants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, as section 14, the following:

SEC. 14. That commissioned officers of the Army on the active-list are hereby authorized to make deposits of money with any army paymaster, not to exceed one-half pay in any one year; and all the provisions and restrictions of the act of May 15, 1872, "establishing a system of deposits," are hereby made applicable to such deposits: Provided, That officers are hereby authorized to withdraw their deposits on the completion of each and every term of three years' service from the date of their first deposit under this act at such frontier posts as may be designated by the Secretary of War.

Mr. LOGAN. The words "at such frontier posts as may be designated by the Secretary of War" were stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper is not so printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out those words which occur after the word "act," in line 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that amendment will be made to the amendment of the committee. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, to insert, as section 15, the following:

SEC. 15. That the act of May 15, 1872, "establishing a system of deposits for enlisted men," is hereby so amended as to apply only to enlisted men on the active-list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, as section 16, the following:

SEC. 16. That hereafter the inspections made of paymasters' accounts, offices, their duties, &c., shall be made by officers of the Pay Department detailed for that purpose, on the recommendation of the Paymaster-General, by the Secretary of War, such detail among paymasters not to be continued for more than one year; other paymasters shall be detailed and so on, in each year alternating the detail.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator from Illinois one question about a portion of that section. It provides:

That hereafter the inspections made of paymasters' accounts, offices, their duties, &c., shall be made by officers of the Pay Department detailed for that purpose, on the recommendation of the Paymaster-General, by the Secretary of War.

Would not that in effect give the power of designation for this duty not to the Secretary of War, who is the head of the Department, but to the Paymaster-General, his subordinate? And does the Senator desire that?

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to changing that; but I do not see any objection to that even. The Paymaster-General is in charge of the Pay Department and responsible for it, and certainly it would be his duty to select the best men he could find for the purpose of making that inspection. The Secretary of War certainly would not know who the best men were except as they should be suggested to him by an officer. Hence we put in the name of the Paymaster-General, because he, being the responsible head of the Pay Department, would be more likely to suggest proper men than one who knew nothing about them.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that any prudent, careful Secretary of War would confer and consult with the head of the Pay Department; but I should not like to see anything embodied in the statute law that takes away the authority of the head of the Department.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not the slightest objection to the amendment. There was no design in it whatever, except merely to have it so that it would be consistent with the duties of the office.

Mr. HALE. I think so, but I think as the section stands now the Secretary of War would have no right to make such designation unless it was recommended by the Paymaster-General. I do not think that is a good feature, and therefore I move to strike out the words "on the recommendation of the Paymaster-General," in line 4.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not the slightest objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. There are some other amendments I desire to offer, which are moved at the suggestion of the Secretary of War. In line 5 of section 1, after the words "garrison court-martial," I move to strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may;" so as to read:

That hereafter, in time of peace, all offenders in the Army charged with offenses now punishable by a regimental or garrison court-martial may be brought before a summary court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 6, after the word "officer," I move to insert the words "of the line." That is done with a view of protecting medical officers and so on from performing that duty. It would then read:

May be brought before a summary court-martial, which shall consist of the commissioned officer of the line second in rank at the post or station of the offender.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest a change of that language.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Say "a commissioned officer of the line;" so as to read: "which shall consist of a commissioned officer of the line."

Mr. LOGAN. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection this amendment will be adopted. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, in line 5, section 3, before the word "quartermaster," I move to insert "regimental," so as to read "regimental quartermaster." That is to prevent the provision applying to post-quartermasters.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 4 of section 13 I move to strike out "commissary" and insert the word "ordnance;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to cause the enlistment of competent instructors for post schools, who shall have the rank and pay of ordnance-sergeants.

Mr. COCKRELL What is the difference in the pay?

Mr. LOGAN. Only about $4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a suggestion from the Secretary of War that I wish to offer, so that it may be looked into and considered. I am not so very sure about it myself; I have not thought sufficiently about the subject; but I desire to offer it now, and I can withdraw it afterward if I deem it necessary to do so. After the word "court-martial," in line 16 of section 1, I move to insert:

And regulations shall be established by the President prescribing a definite and graded penal code for the guidance of the summary courts provided for in this section in awarding punishment to offenders convicted before such courts

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. LOGAN. I am not sure that I want this amendment myself, but I offer the amendment and I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill with the amendments already adopted and those proposed be printed again.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall be glad to have that done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. HALE. I give notice that I will move to-morrow to strike out section 2.

Mr. MANDERSON. I send to the Chair a proposed amendment to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolutions reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I ask my friend from Georgia to allow me to call up a bill I have been waiting a month to have considered, and it is rather important that it should be passed upon so that it may go to the House and receive consideration there. It is for a site for the post-office in this city. It is Order of Business 158.

Mr. BROWN. If it can be passed without any discussion I shall not object.

Mr. MORRILL. It will not be discussed. It has passed almost unanimously heretofore once or twice.

Mr. BROWN. Then I yield for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406, of the city of Washington, for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building and to provide accommodations for the city post-office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to print additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1885.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TUCKER, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. J. W. STEWART managers at the conference on its part.

INDIAN TRAINING SCHOOL IN OREGON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs "to authorize the purchase of a tract of land near Salem, Oreg., for the use of the Indian training school."

The subject is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 18, 1886.

PROCEEDS OF SALES OF INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs providing for the use of certain funds, proceeds of Indian reservations, covered into the Treasury under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, for the benefit of the Indians on whose account the same is covered in.

The subject is recommended to the favorable consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 18, 1886.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of February 9, 1886, I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with its accompanying documents, relative to the commerce between the United States and certain foreign countries in cereals and the cotton product during the years 1884 and 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, March 18, 1886.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I offer an amendment to the pending resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by adding to the second resolution:

And in all such cases of removal the matter of confirmation shall be considered in open session of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie over.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, it seems to me there is but a single question in issue between the President of the United States and the majority of this Senate. The question is, has the President the power to remove a Federal officer, when, in his opinion, the public interest requires such removal, without the advice and consent of the Senate, or is his power of removal confined to cases where the Senate advises and consents to the removal? This is an important question. If the Constitution confers the power of removal in such cases upon the President, then the Senate has no right to interfere with him in the exercise of that power, but if the Constitution does not confer the power of removal upon the President and does confer upon Congress the right to legislate upon the question of removals, then we must look to the acts of Congress in determining who has the right to exercise the power of removal.

Now, let us examine for a moment the constitutional provisions on this subject. The Constitution, Article II, section 1, declares that—

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

In Article II, section 3, the Constitution declares that—

He [the President] shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

In section 1 of Article II it declares that before he enters on the execution of his office the President shall solemnly swear that he will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States.

These provisions of the Constitution, without other limitation, would seem to vest the full and entire executive power of the Government in the President, and not only to vest the executive power in him, but to enjoin upon him that he shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed, and to this end the Constitution adds the solemn sanction of his official oath.

What is the executive power of this Government which is vested in the President of the United States? It embraces the power and duty of taking care that the laws are faithfully executed. Taken without limitation or qualification, it confers on the President the power to appoint at his pleasure such officers, the offices having been established by Congress, as are necessary to the full, honest, and faithful execution of the laws of the United States; and if in any case any officer or agent so appointed by the President should fail properly to discharge the duties assigned him, whether from incompetency, malpractice, neglect of duty, or from any other cause whatever which rendered him practically inefficient, or which proved him to be unfaithful to his trust and dishonest, the President would have the undoubted power to remove him and put another in his place who would faithfully discharge the duties assigned to him.

It follows, therefore, conclusively to my mind that the President, possessed of the entire executive power of this Government, commanded by the Constitution to see to it that the laws are faithfully executed and who has sworn faithfully to discharge that trust, does possess, unless there is some other qualification in the Constitution to limit his power, the absolute right of appointment and removal of officers necessary to aid in the execution of that great trust. If, in other words, the Constitution contained no other provisions on that subject except those which I have read, it seems to me there could be no question of the absolute power of the President to remove a corrupt or inefficient officer, or indeed to remove any officer, when in his opinion the public interest requires a change, and to appoint a successor.

I do not believe this position can be successfully controverted.

Now, Mr. President, after the Constitution has in explicit terms conferred upon the President this high, plenary, and absolute power of executing the laws constitutionally passed by Congress, by what qualifications has the Constitution limited this power? The power conferred upon the Executive by the provisions of the Constitution already referred to to execute the laws, being full, plenary, and absolute, we must look to the Constitution itself for such limitation of those powers as the framers of that instrument thought proper to impose.

What are the limitations imposed by the Constitution? Article II, section 2, of the Constitution puts a limitation on his power of appointment. It declares that he (the President) shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Now, here is a limitation upon the absolute power of appointment conferred on the President as possessor of the otherwise full executive power, to wit: That in the appointment of embassadors and the other officers mentioned he must have the advice and consent of the Senate before the appointment is complete. The portion of the Constitution here quoted would therefore in all cases of offices established either by the Constitution or by law give the President the appointing power with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he could make no appointment without their advice and consent in any case, and neither the Congress of the United States nor any other authority, if the limitation stopped here, could take from him the plenary power of appointing all officers of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

But the Constitution does not stop here. After conferring this power on the President and Senate of appointment of all officers, it provides that Congress (and here is where the power of Congress comes in) may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. Now what part has Congress to act in this matter if it keeps itself within the limits of the Constitution? It has no power of appointment and no power to direct appointments; but the President alone, by the advice and consent of the Senate, has a right to make all appointments until Congress by law has thought proper to vest the appointment of inferior officers either in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. Congress has, therefore, under the Constitution no power whatever to vest the appointment of any inferior officer in any person or Department except the President alone, or the courts of law, or the heads of Departments, nor has Congress the right to put any limitation upon the appointing power of the President which has not been placed there by the Constitution. Congress can say that the President may appoint inferior officers without the advice and consent of the Senate, but it has no right to say that the President may appoint any superior officer without the consent of the Senate.

Congress has power to create offices but it has no power to change the constitutional mode of appointing officers, and it has no power to confer the appointment of inferior officers on anybody but the President, or the courts of law, or the heads of Departments. Congress does therefore possess the power to divest the authority of the President and the Senate to appoint inferior officers, but it has no power to limit the jurisdiction of the President or the Senate over the appointment of superior officers. Congress may by law invest the courts or the heads of Departments with the appointment of all inferior officers without any interference by the President or the Senate, but it can not limit the authority of the President and Senate in making appointments in any other manner than that prescribed by the Constitution, nor can it vest the appointing power in any other person or tribunal, except in the three instances just mentioned.

When Congress has declared that the appointment of any inferior officer shall be vested in the President alone, it has interfered only in part with the power of the Senate over the question of appointments. It has divested the jurisdiction of the Senate in case of such inferior officers, and left their appointment to the President alone; but if Congress thinks proper to confer the power on the courts of law or the heads of Departments, it thereby divests the jurisdiction of the President and the Senate over the appointment. But Congress can only do this by law, and when it is done Congress has exhausted its power over appointments. Beyond that, it can take from the President no power of appointment or removal which the Constitution has conferred upon him, and it can divest the Senate of no jurisdiction it has over the subject of appointments.

But it will be observed that the provisions of the Constitution last referred to say nothing about removals from office. No one questions that the power resides somewhere to make removals of officers employed in the execution of the laws of the United States. Who has that power? Clearly Congress does not have it as the legislative department of the Government, for there is no provision of the Constitution that confers it on Congress.

Does the Senate possess it? No provision of the Constitution confers it upon the Senate.

In case of appointments the Constitution declares that the President may make them by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, therefore the Constitution gives the Senate jurisdiction in such cases; but I find no provision in the Constitution which gives the Senate any jurisdiction over the subject of removals or any right of interference in case of removals. As Congress as the legislative branch of the Government does not possess the power, and it is not claimed that the judicial department possesses it, and as the Constitution has not conferred the power on the Senate, who does possess the power to remove incompetent or unfaithful officers?

I answer that the power rests in the President and in him alone. In the President is vested the executive power of the United States of America, and he alone is required to take care that the laws are faithfully executed, and he alone has sworn faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States, upon whom the power is conferred. It is clear, therefore, to my mind that neither the Congress of the United States, nor the House of Representatives, nor the judicial department, nor the Senate of the United States possesses any power whatever over the subject of removals of officers engaged in the execution of the laws under the appointment of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that the above is the true construction of the Constitution. But let us see what has been the contemporaneous construction, for if there is doubt as to its meaning every lawyer knows that we look prominently, among other things, to the contemporaneous construction of the statute or the Constitution for its true meaning.

In 1789, when the First Congress assembled, the question of the organization of the Government under the new Constitution became a difficult and embarrassing one.

Mr. Boudinot, a distinguished Representative from the State of New Jersey, presented to the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole the question of the necessity of organizing the great executive departments of the Government, which were not in existence. He desired the committee to consider how many Departments there should be, and moved that there be established in aid of the Chief Magistrate three Executive Departments, to be severally denominated the Departments of Foreign Affairs, Treasury, and War. (See Annals of Congress, volume 1, page 368.)

Mr. Madison moved that it is the opinion of this committee that there shall be established an executive department to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, at the head of which there shall be an officer to be called the Secretary of the Department of Foreign Affairs, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and be removable by the President.

Mr. Madison, the great constitutional lawyer, who was justly termed the Father of the Constitution, in the first proposition that was made, drew sharply the line between the powers of the Senate and the President.

This first Cabinet officer was to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate and removable by the President. This led to a long discussion in which a number of members participated, some for and some against. But I shall quote especially from Mr. Madison on account of his eminent abilities, and because he had more to do in making the Constitution, and probably understood it better, than any other man living at the time. He says:

I think it absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removing from office. It will make him in a peculiar manner responsible for their conduct and subject him to impeachment himself if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States, or neglects to superintend their conduct so as to check their excesses. On the constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt.

Some contended that an officer could not be removed except by impeachment; others, that he should be removed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, but Mr. Madison said he had no manner of doubt as to the constitutionality of his removal by the President alone.

During the discussion Mr. Benson said he thought this an important question, and one in which they were obliged to take the Constitution by construction, for although it detailed the mode of appointing to office, it was not explicit as to supersedure. This clause therefore would be a mere declaration of the legislative construction on this point. He thought the importance and necessity of making the declaration that the Chief Magistrate might supersede a civil officer was evident, and he therefore voted in favor of the clause as it stood.

Mr. Vining said there were no negative words in the Constitution to preclude the President from the exercise of this power, but there was a strong presumption that he was invested with it, because it was declared that all executive power should be vested in him except in case where it is otherwise qualified; as for example he could not fully exercise his executive power in making treaties unless with the advice and consent of the Senate, the same in appointment to office. He had no doubt but that the Constitution gave this power to the President, but if doubts were entertained he thought it prudent to make a legislative declaration of the sentiments of Congress on this point. Mr. Goodhue said:

He wished to make the President as responsible as possible for the conduct of officers who were to execute the duties of his own branch of the Government. If a removal and appointment were placed in the hands of a numerous body, the responsibility would be lessened. He admitted that there was a propriety in allowing the Senate to advise the President in the choice of officers. This the Constitution had ordained for a wise purpose, but there could be no real advantage arising from the concurrence of the Senate to the removal, but great disadvantages. It might beget faction and party, which would prevent the Senate from paying proper attention to public duties. Upon the whole he concluded the community would be served by the best men when the Senate concurred with the President in the appointment, but if any oversight was committed it could best be corrected by the superintending agent. It was the peculiar duty of the President to watch over the executive officers, but of what avail would be his inspection unless he had a power to correct the abuses he might discover?

Again, Mr. Madison says:

It is said that it comports with the nature of things that those who appoint should have the power of removal, but I can not conceive this sentiment is warranted by the Constitution. I believe it would be found very inconvenient in practice. It is one of the most prominent features of the Constitution, a principle that pervades the whole system, that there should be the highest possible degree of responsibility in all the executive officers thereof. Anything therefore which tends to lessen that responsibility is contrary to its spirit and intention, and unless it is saddled upon us expressly by the letter of that work I shall oppose the admission of it into any act of the Legislature. Now, if the heads of Departments are subjected to removal by the President alone, we have in him security for the good behavior of the officer. If he does not conform to the judgment of the President in aiding the execution of the duties of his office he can be displaced. This makes him responsible to the great executive power and makes the President responsible to the public for the conduct of the person he has nominated and appointed to aid him in the administration of his department. But if the President shall join in a collusion with this officer and continue a bad [man in office, the case of impeachment will reach the culprit and drag him forth to punishment.

But if you take the other construction, and say he shall not be displaced but by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the President is no longer answerable for the conduct of the officer. All will depend upon the Senate. You here destroy the real responsibility, without obtaining even the shadow; for no gentleman can pretend to say that the responsibility of the Senate can be of such nature as to afford substantial security. But why, it may be asked, was the Senate joined with the President in appointment to office if they have no responsibility? I answer, merely for the sake of advising, being supposed from their nature better acquainted with the character of the candidates than an individual; yet even here the President is held to the responsibility—he nominates and with their consent appoints. No person can be forced upon him as an assistant by any branch of the Government.

Mr. Clymer said:

The power of removal was an executive power, and as such, belonged to the President alone by the express words of the Constitution, "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The Senate were not an executive body, they were a legislative one. It was true in some instances they had a qualified check over the executive power, but that was in consequence of an express declaration in the Constitution. Without that declaration they would not have been called upon for advice and consent in case of appointment. Why, then, shall we extend their power to control that which is naturally in the Executive, unless it is likewise expressly declared in the Constitution?

Mr. Vining said:

It is well known that the Senate are to decide upon an impeachment made by the House. Now, can they be impartial judges when they have already given their judgment in the case? Suppose the President communicates his suspicions to the Senate respecting the malfeasance of a public officer, and they, from factious or party views, or indeed for want of information, refuse their consent to the removal, can they be the equal and unbiased judicature which the Constitution contemplates them to be?

He thought they could not.

The motion of Mr. Madison was carried by a very considerable majority in favor of declaring the power of removal to be in the President, and the same construction prevailed in the Senate.

Referring to this act of the Congress of 1789 in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, Chief-Justice Marshall says:

By the Constitution of the United States the President is invested with certain important political powers in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties he is authorized to appoint certain officers who act by his authority and in conformity to his orders. In such cases their acts are his acts, and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists and can exist no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the nation, not individual rights, and being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived by adverting to the act of Congress for establishing a department of foreign affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by that act, has to conform precisely to the will of the President. He is the mere organ by whom his will is communicated.

Again he says:

Where the head of a Department acts in a case in which the Executive discretion is to be exercised in which he is the mere organ of executive will, it is again repeated that any application to a court to control in any respect, his conduct would be rejected without hesitation.

Chancellor Kent, that great legal luminary, in his Commentaries, volume 1, page 334, speaking of the action of the Congress of 1789 in reference to the power of the President to make removals, says:

This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of the Government appointed by the President and Senate whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officer in the Executive Department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that Department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle and ought to be taken strictly.

Farther down the page he says:

It may now be considered as firmly and definitely settled, and there is good sense and practical utility in the construction.

The Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Thompson delivering the opinion in Hennen's case, 13 Peters's Reports, 259, says:

But it was very early adopted as the practical construction of the Constitution that this power [of removal] was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution.

Again, referring to the difference in phraseology between the act establishing the Naval Department and that establishing the other Departments, he says:

The change of phraseology arose probably from its having been the settled and well understood construction of the Constitution that the power of removal was vested in the President alone in such cases, although the appointment of the officer was by the President and the Senate.

Speaking of the power of removal, Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Blake's case, 13 Otto, says:

But it was early adopted as a part of the construction of the Constitution that this power was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution.

He then cites, first, Kent's Commentaries, 309; 2 Story on the Constitution, 4th edition, sections 1537 to 1540, and notes; and, 2d, Marshall's Life of Washington, 162; Sergeant's Constitutional Law, 372; and Rawle's, chap. 14. He then adds:

During the administration of President Tyler the question was propounded by the Secretary of the Navy to Attorney-General Legaré whether the President could strike an officer from the rolls without a trial by court-martial, after a decision in that officer's favor by a court of inquiry, ordered for the investigation of his conduct.

His response was:

Whatever I might have thought of the power of removal from office, if the subject were res integra, it is now too late to dispute the settled construction of 1789. It is according to that construction, from the very nature of executive power, absolute in the President, subject only to his responsibility to the country [his constituents] for a breach of such a vast and solemn trust. (3 Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, 379, section 1538.)

It is obvious that if necessity is a sufficient ground for such concession in regard to officers in the civil service, the argument applies a multo fortiori to the military and naval departments. I have no doubt, therefore, that the President had the constitutional power to do what he did, and that the officer in question is not in the service of the United States. The same views were expressed by subsequent Attorneys-General.

(Citing a number of cases).

In Du Barry's case, Attorney-General Clifford said that an attempt to limit the exercise of the power of removal to executive officers in the civil service found no support in the language of the Constitution, nor in any judicial decision, and that there was no foundation in the Constitution for any distinction in this regard between civil and military officers.

In Lansing's case the question arose as to the power of the President in his discretion to remove a military storekeeper. Attorney-General Cushing said:

Conceding, however, that military storekeepers are officers, or at least quasi officers of the Army, it does not follow that they are not subject to be deprived of their commissions at the will of the President. I am not aware of any ground of distinction in this respect so far as regards a strict construction of law between officers of the Army and any other officer of the Government. As a general rule, with the exception of judicial officers only, they all hold their commissions by the same tenure in this respect. Reasons of a special nature may be deemed to exist why the rule should not be applied to the military in the same way as it is to civil officers, but the legal applicability to both classes of officers is, it is conceived, the settled construction of the Constitution. It is no answer to this doctrine to say that officers of the Army are subject to be deprived of their commissions by the decision of a court-martial. So are civil officers by impeachment. The difference between the two cases is in the form and mode of trial, not in the principle, which leaves unimpaired in both cases alike the whole constitutional power of the President.

It seems unnecessary in this case to recapitulate in detail the elements of constitutional construction and historical induction by which this doctrine has been established as the public law of the United States.

I observe only that, so far as regards the question of abstract power, I know of nothing essential in the grounds of legal conclusion, which have been so thoroughly explored at different times in respect to the civil officers, which does not apply to officers of the Army.

The same officer subsequently, when required to consider this question, said that—

The power has been exercised in many cases with the approbation, express or implied, of the Senate, and without challenge by any legislative act of Congress. And it is expressly reserved in every commission of the officers both of the Navy and Army. (8 Opinions, 231.)

Such, says Judge Harlan, was the established practice in the executive department, and such the recognized power of the President up to the passage of the act of July 17, 1862.

Speaking of the power of the President to make removals, Attorney-General Devens (15 Opinions, 431) states, with much reason, that—

So far as it gives authority to the President, it is simply declaratory of the long-established law.

We have then the concurrent testimony of our most distinguished commentators and judges, such as Marshall, Kent, Story, Sergeant, Rawle, and of many of the most distinguished of the Attorneys-General of the United States, such as Legaré, Clifford, Crittenden, Cushing, Devens, and several others; and we have a number of the most distinguished Republican statesmen of the present day, as well as the unbroken practice of the different Presidents through all the administrations down to 1867, to the effect that it was the settled construction of the Constitution for the first seventy-eight years of the existence of the Government that the President had the power, in the exercise of his sound discretion, without consulting the Senate, to remove Federal officers, whether civil or military.

So much for the constitutional construction which prevailed for the first three-quarters of a century of the life of the Republic.

Unfortunately, about the end of that period the two sections of the country became engaged in civil war. At the end of the unfortunate struggle the dominant party which then controlled Congress by more than two-thirds majority, at a time when passion and prejudice were at the highest, found in the executive chair a President who had been elected by them to the Vice-Presidency, who had been a Democrat all his life, and had been put upon the Republican ticket because he was a consistent Union man and what was called a "War Democrat." Andrew Johnson, who became President by the unfortunate death of Mr. Lincoln, was not in accord with the party that placed him in power. The feeling of antagonism became intensified, and the Republican Congress determined that he should not exercise the same constitutional powers which had been exercised without successful contention as to their authority continuously by other Presidents for three-quarters of a century; and to hedge in the President, so that he might not exercise these powers, which had been conceded without interruption to his predecessors, Congress passed the act of 1867 during the period when excitement and prejudice were at their highest point. The two first sections of that act were in the following language:

SECTION 1. That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate, as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

Mr. President, this act was thoroughly radical. It reversed the ruling and practice of the Government for the last three-quarters of a century. It denied absolutely the power of the President to make removals without the advice and consent of the Senate. It did not permit such removals unless it was shown by evidence satisfactory to the President that misconduct in office, or crime, or incapability, or legal disqualification to perform the duties of the office existed in the incumbent. It made the suspension until the next meeting of the Senate and until the case should be acted upon, and required the President to report the case to the Senate within twenty days after its meeting with the evidence and his reasons for his action, and in the event the Senate failed to advise and consent to the removal it reinstated the original incumbent. Either the construction of the Fathers who made the Constitution, and of a long line of Presidents, and the opinions of many of the most distinguished lawyers and jurists of this country were radically wrong, or this act was a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States.

As already stated, it was passed by a large majority at a time of high political excitement to serve a party purpose and to throw obstructions in the way of a President who was very obnoxious to the party in power.

On May 2, 1869, a change of administration having taken place, General Grant having been elected President, that distinguished officer sent a message to Congress recommending the repeal of this act, which I think I do not characterize too strongly when I say it was conceived in passion and brought forth in prejudice, and should, as General Grant recommended, have been swept from the statute-book without delay.

The party in power having refused to do this, they passed an act on the 5th day of April, 1869, by which the two sections of the act of 1867, which I have quoted, are declared to be repealed, and in lieu of said sections the following was enacted:

First. That every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he shall have been appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. That during any recess of the Senate the President is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the United States courts, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed in his discretion, by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time; and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall, during the time he performs his duties, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of such office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended, and it shall be the duty of the President within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, to nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

Now, Mr. President, the two first sections of the act of 1867 are essentially at variance with the act of 1869. The first act, as already stated, was passed in a time of high political excitement and prejudice.

Two years later, passion and prejudice had in a great measure subsided, and the Congress were in better condition to consider the great question with which they were dealing. It is true that section 1 of the act of 1869 retains the substantial provision of section 1 of the act of 1867, to the effect that an officer holding office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall not be removed by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate, "except as herein otherwise provided."

The second section provides otherwise in case of all suspensions made by the President during the recess of the Senate. The act of 1867 limits the President during the recess of the Senate in making suspensions to cases where he can show misconduct, or crime, or incapability, or disqualification, and he is bound to report the suspension to the Senate, with the evidence and reasons for his action. Now if this were the law to-day, and it were passed without violation of the Constitution of the United States, there would be no question that the Senate in acting upon the case of a suspended Federal officer would have the right to call upon the President not only for the papers in his possession which related to the removal, but for all the evidence he might possess in the case. This was the absurd extent to which the act of 1867 was carried in violation of the fundamental law of this land. So much for the act when it was intended to operate upon the administration of Andrew Johnson. Let us see how it stands when it was arranged for the benefit of the administration of General Grant.

Section 2 of the act of 1869 must be construed in connection with the first section of that act, which, as already stated, denies to the President the power to remove an officer who has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate without the like advice and consent of the Senate, but adds the significant words "except as herein otherwise provided." And it is herein otherwise provided as to all suspensions made during the recess of the Senate, and instead of being made on charges as already mentioned, the President is empowered to make then in his discretion. As stated by Chief-Justice Marshall in the case to which I have already referred—

Whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which the executive discretion may be used, still there exists and can exist no power to control that discretion. The rights being intrusted to the executive discretion, the decision of the Executive is conclusive. If the President has willfully and corruptly abused his discretion there is a remedy by impeachment.

The act of 1867 contemplates the separate action of the Senate, first on the proposition to suspend the officer, and then on the proposition to appoint his successor. The act makes it the duty of the President to report to the Senate such suspension with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case; and if the Senate shall concur in such suspension (clearly contemplating a vote of the Senate on the question of suspension) and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer. This contemplates a report by the President to the Senate of such suspension, with his reasons for the removal, and the action of the Senate upon it, and a notification to the President that they have consented to the removal; and when the President has received such notice, it provides that he may thereupon remove such officer, and it adds, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" (contemplating another vote) appoint another person in his place. Under the act of 1867 the Senate has to act first upon the proposition to suspend or remove the officer, and if they concur the President may then make the removal, and after the removal has been made, there being a vacancy, of course the President may nominate some one to fill the vacancy, and the Senate may consent, or refuse to consent, to the appointment.

In place of these provisions of the act of 1867 the act of 1869 simply makes it the duty of the President, as in case of all other vacancies, to nominate some proper person to fill the place, and if the Senate during such session refuses to consent to the appointment, not the removal, then it is made the duty of the President to nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

So you will observe, Mr. President, that the act of 1869 repeals all the important provisions of the act of 1867, which the political party that enacted it could not endure for two years, and leaves the President to act with unlimited discretion in the matter of suspensions during the recess of the Senate.

Again, the act of 1867 and the act of 1869 are very unlike in another respect. The act of 1867 provides that if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing the duties in his stead shall cease. The act of 1869 makes no provision for the resumption by the suspended officer of the functions of his office in any case. It provides that if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall do what? Reinstate the suspended officer? No. The President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to said session of the Senate for said office.

Here, then, the unlimited power of suspension of Federal officers during the recess of the Senate is conferred absolutely upon the President in his discretion, and when he has suspended such officer there is no power in the Senate or in any other tribunal, without the consent of the President, to reinstate the suspended officer. So that he may, as provided in the first section of the act of 1869, "hold such office during the term for which he shall have been appointed," or hold it for a single day. The act of 1867, as already stated, made provision for reinstating him. The act of 1869 denies to the suspended officer the right to be reinstated and "hold such office during the term for which he was appointed." It treats the case as a vacancy, and makes it the duty of the President, as soon as practicable, to nominate another person in case the Senate refuses to confirm the person nominated as his successor. If the act of 1869 had intended that the officer be reinstated it would have made provision for a vote of the Senate on the removal of the suspended officer, as in case of the act of 1867.

The statute makes no such provision, and confers upon this Senate no power to vote on the question of removal. If it is contended that the vote on the confirmation of the nominee of the President, if unfavorable, is a vote against the removal of the original incumbent and works a rejection of the nominee and reinstates the incumbent, then the subsequent provision of the statute which declares in such case that the President shall, as soon as practicable, nominate another person to fill the place is a simple absurdity. In other words, if the vote of the Senate to reject the nominees is to be taken as a vote against the removal of the suspended officer, why is it necessary to have two or more votes against the suspension? If the President nominates another person for the office and the Senate then refuses to confirm that person, which one of the votes, and both are required by the statute, is the vote against the removal, and which is the vote on the confirmation of the nominee? How is the President to know when he is informed that the Senate has rejected the nominee whether it did it because it was unwilling to remove the suspended officer or because of the alleged incompetency or bad character of the nominee?

Did the first vote of rejection mean that the Senate was opposed to the removal or that the nominee was an improper person, and what was the meaning of the second vote of the Senate on the confirmation of the second nominee? How many votes rejecting nominees are necessary to indicate the will of the Senate that they will not consent to the removal of the original incumbent, and if a vote against the nominee amounts to a refusal to remove the incumbent, why not reinstate him in his office as soon as the first vote of rejection has been had, and why does the statute direct the President as soon as practicable to make another nomination to fill the place? The very fact that the President is required, in case of a rejection of the nominee, to make another nomination to fill the same place shows conclusively that Congress intended to treat it as a vacancy and make it the duty of the President to fill it as other vacancies are filled, by continuing to make nominations until a person shall be nominated who commands the consent of the Senate. Is it necessary for the President to make two nominations of persons to fill the place of the suspended officer and take a vote of the Senate on each before it can be said that the Senate has refused to concur in the removal by such vote?

Suppose, as in case of other vacancies, that the Senate should reject the second nominee, why might he not send a third and a fourth, and if the Senate should reject each, which vote of rejection of the nominee was the vote refusing to consent to the removal of the suspended officer? Was it the first? No, because the statute provides for another nomination and a second vote, not on the removal, but on the confirmation, and who can doubt in that case that if the Senate should reject the second nominee, the President, by virtue of the power vested in him by the Constitution, would have the right to make a third, or a fourth, or as many more as might be necessary until the Senate should confirm some worthy nominee? But it may be said that in such case the Senate would refuse to confirm any nominee. We can not suppose that the Senate would do so unjust and absurd an act as to refuse to confirm a second nominee if he were worthy and well qualified and there were no good cause of rejection. We can not suppose the Senate would act upon its prejudice, its passion, or its feeling of hostility to the President in confirming or rejecting a nomination made by him. Such action would lower the dignity of the Senate and do gross injustice to the individual.

But suppose I am wrong about all this, and when the Senate has rejected a first and second nominee to fill the place of the suspended officer—for both votes are required by the statute—and has adjourned without consenting to the appointment of any one to fill it, that such adjournment by the Senate without action restores the suspended officer to his office, still he is not reinstated, so that he can, under the language of the first section of the act, "hold such office;" for no one, I apprehend, will question the right of the President the very hour that the Senate has adjourned to issue another order suspending him, and appointing a proper person to take the office with its emoluments. Bear in mind, then, Mr. President, that there is no provision in the act of 1869 that practically reinstates the suspended officer in his office. The Senate has no power to reinstate him and authorize him to "hold his office." He can not under any possibility without the consent of the President, after he has once been suspended, hold the position for a single hour. If the President suspends him again as soon as the Senate adjourns he is practically out of office until the adjournment of the next session of the Senate, and nobody will deny, I suppose, that the President in his discretion may suspend him from time to time as often as there is a recess of the Senate and appoint another person to hold the office until the end of the next session of the Senate. If the Senate during each session refuses to confirm the nominee, it is made the duty of the President not to reinstate the suspended officer, but at each session to nominate another person to fill the office.

But it has been argued here that the Supreme Court of the United States, in Embry's case, United States Reports, volume 100, has decided that the suspended officer is reinstated after the Senate adjourns without confirming his successor. An examination of that case will show that the Senator who used it was mistaken as to the point decided. The question raised was not one of the right of the suspended officer to be reinstated in his office, but it was a question who had the right to the salary during the time of the suspension, and the Supreme Court decided, and all that it did decide was, that the suspended officer had no right to the salary during the time, but that the person who filled the office and did the duties was entitled to the salary. That was the decision, and it was all that was decided. In that case, the First Assistant Postmaster-General had notified the suspended officer after the adjournment of the Senate to resume the duties of the office until the case could be submitted to the Attorney-General, and no question had been raised about the effect of the suspension or his right to be reinstated. It was an action brought by the suspended officer for the salary during the time he was out of office.

Chief-Justice Waite says, in delivering the opinion:

> We have had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the appellant is not entitled to recover. The important constitutional question which has at times occupied the attention of the political departments of the Government ever since its organization, and which was brought to our attention in the argument, is not, as we think, involved. The question here presented is not one of office, but of salary. Wherever the power of removal from office may rest, all agree that Congress has full control of salaries, except those of the President and judges of the courts of the United States.

The question before the Supreme Court of the United States in Embry's case, therefore, was a question of salary, and the Chief-Justice expressly disclaims even the consideration of the question as to whether the President had the right to make removals from office, or whether the Senate had a right to be consulted. The decision, therefore, practically has no bearing on this question.

Then, as neither the Senate nor any other tribunal has any power to prevent the suspension, in the discretion of the President, during the recess of the Senate, and as neither the Senate nor any other power in this Government can practically reinstate the suspended officer, what has the Senate to do with the case of suspension or removal? It has no jurisdiction and no power to control it, and it usurps an authority not conferred upon it by the Constitution or the laws when it attempts to interfere. It has no more right to demand of the President the evidence on which he acted or the reasons for his action than it has to demand of the Supreme Court the reasons for the decision made by that court, or to demand of the House of Representatives the reasons why it refused to pass a bill passed and sent to it by the Senate. It has no more power over the subject than the President has to require the Senate, when he has nominated a person to fill a vacancy, to give the reasons for the rejection of such person or to produce the papers that influenced the action of the Senate. The attempt is a naked, bald usurpation on the part of this Senate.

Mr. President, the absurd act of 1867 never was the law of this land. It is in plain and palpable violation of the provisions of the Constitution to which I have referred. It attempted without authority to limit the legitimate power which the Constitution confers upon the President in making removals from office.

I conclude, then, that the provision of the Constitution which confers upon the President the executive power of the United States confers the right subject to the qualifications afterward mentioned, to appoint or remove any and all officers of the United States. The unlimited executive power of a State certainly carries with it the power of appointment and removal of the persons to fill the offices designated by law as necessary to the complete execution of the executive power. This executive power vested by the Constitution in the President has the following limitations:

That the President has no power to remove a judge of the United States courts.

That the President's appointing power is subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

That Congress has no power to limit the appointing power of the President and Senate in case of superior officers.

That Congress has the power by law to divest the appointing power of the President and the Senate in case of inferior officers, by conferring the power of appointment on the courts of law or the heads of Departments, or it may divest the power of the Senate over the question by conferring the power of appointment of inferior officers upon the President alone. But this power rests with the President and Senate until Congress has vested it in the President alone, or in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments; and Congress can vest it nowhere else.

That Congress has no appointing power, but it may by law confer on the President or the courts of law or the heads of Departments the appointing power in case of inferior officers.

That the executive power, which includes the power of appointment and removal, when conferred without other limitation, is still left in the hands of the President with the qualifications as to treaties and appointments already mentioned.

That the executive power vested in the President confers on him the power of removal in all cases of appointments made with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that power is not limited as in the case of the appointing power by any other provision of the Constitution.

The legislative department of the Government has no right to limit it, because the Constitution has conferred it upon the President without limitation. The Senate has no right to limit it, because the Senate possesses only such powers as are conferred upon it by the Constitution, and the Constitution confers upon the Senate no authority to limit the President's power of removal which he possesses as an important part of his executive power.

I hold, then, that the President possesses under the Constitution, except in the case of judges of the United States courts, the unlimited power in his discretion to remove all Federal office-holders appointed as above mentioned by the President with the consent of the Senate, and for the exercise of that power he is neither amenable to Congress nor the Senate, unless he acts corruptly, in which case he may be reached by the power of impeachment. But neither the Congress nor the Senate has any power to call upon him to account for any act of removal in any other manner. Neither the legislative department of the Government, nor the executive department, nor the Senate, nor any other officer of the Government, has the right to require him to produce any papers which he may have inspected while acting upon the case, or to give any reasons whatever for his exercise of the discretion vested in him by the Constitution of the United States.

I therefore conclude that the attempt made by the majority of this Senate to compel the President to deliver to the Senate the papers upon which he may have acted in the matter of a suspension or removal from office is not founded on any authority conferred upon this Senate by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

The people of this country constitute the high court of appeals, and it is the judgment of that high court not that the President has used the power of removal too freely, but that he has failed to use it with sufficient energy.

If there is any charge against him in the popular mind, it is not the charge of commission but the charge of omission, not that he has made mistakes in making appointments or removals from office (doubtless like all other men he has made mistakes), but that his greatest mistake has been that he omitted to use the power of removal with sufficient activity.

When the people of the United States called the President to the high and responsible position he now fills, and placed in his hands as a sacred trust the executive power of this Government, they expected in carrying out his policy that he would put in office, and retain in office as his assistants, persons of ability and integrity who concur in his policy and are ready with zeal and energy to render important and faithful service in carrying it into execution. It was not the intention of the people that all the executive offices of the Government should be filled, or partly filled, with political spies, plotting how they can soonest overthrow the administration, and sympathizing more with those who, from the outside, make war upon it than they do with the President and with his friends who are attempting to sustain its policy, which is intended to advance the best interests of the whole people of this country.

Let the President exercise the power conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States, and remove from office those who are not in accord with his administration and not ready to do faithful service in aiding to carry out his policy, and fill their places with honest, capable men who are friends of the administration, and the universal acclaim of the Democracy and the honest masses of this country will be, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant!"

Mr. President, the people, that high court of appeals of last resort, from whose final decision there is no appeal, to whom alone the President is responsible for the manner in which he exercises his discretion in the matter of removals from office, when they have heard the arguments and considered the case on its merits, will order a nonsuit, the cost to be paid by the plaintiffs, in the great case of George F. Edmunds and Company, Republican managers of the Senate, versus Grover Cleveland, President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I make no attempt to disguise the fact, or to apologize for it, that the fortunes of the Republican party are very dear to me and that I wish that party, here and elsewhere, to reap every fair partisan advantage which may be taken from the blunders and from the shortcomings, if any such there are or shall be, of this administration. But I trust I do not forget, and shall not forget, that I am a Senator of the United States as well as a Republican, and that as a Senator my first duty always is to the people, and that I have no right to take action here to subserve a party interest which would be harmful to the interests of the people.

I deny for myself, and I have authority to deny for every Senator upon this side of the Chamber, the statement so often made on the other side that we desire, or are willing, to harrass, hamper, or embarrass the President in the proper exercise of executive functions. Such a motive would be unworthy, and should not be so lightly imputed.

The principle involved in this controversy, to my mind, is far above the question as to who shall hold the offices in the country. If I mistake not the real question in debate, it involves a principle essential to the orderly conduct of the Government. May I go back to the case before the Senate as made by the resolution adopted by the Senate, the only action thus far taken by the Senate, demanding papers of the Attorney-General? This is the resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers "that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885"— in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

Now, note—

That was the demand formulated, not by any Senate committee, but by the Senate, upon the Attorney-General. Allow me to call attention once more to his response, which I venture to say is the most remarkable response that ever came from an executive officer to the legislative department of the Government:

I acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate adopted on the 25th instant, in executive session as follows.

Stress at the outset, it will be observed, is laid upon the fact that the action of the Senate was had in executive session. Let me ask what has that to do with the power of the Senate? Is the Senate one body with one set of powers and functions when it sits with open doors and another and different body when it chooses to transact its business in secret? Does any Democratic Senator on this floor pretend for one moment that if the Senate chose for some reason, satisfactory to itself, to vote upon a bill with closed doors and that bill should be passed by the other House and approved by the President, it would not be a valid law? Would it not be a legitimate exercise of the legislative function of the Senate, though done with closed doors instead of under the eye of the people?

But to return to the response of the Attorney-General:

I acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate adopted on the 25th instant, in executive session, as follows:
Resolved—

Setting forth the resolution—

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett—

The Senate had not called upon the Attorney-General for any papers relating to the fitness for office of John D. Burnett—recently nominated to said office, having been already sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution, and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George W. Duskin.

Not denying at all but admitting the existence of the papers mentioned in the resolution, and that they were filed in that office, he continues:

It is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

It will be borne in mind that the "papers and documents" called for were any filed in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney. If there were none such it would have been easy for the Attorney-General to have said so.

Look at the bald case as it stands before the Senate and before the people, unaided by the message which the President sent upon the same subject, and which is in some sense an additional statement of fact. The Senate calls for certain papers, filed within a given period in a public department, touching the management of a public office. An executive officer of the United States, recognizing the fact that the papers are in his custody, not denying for a moment their existence, says to the Senate, by direction of the President, that "it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session."

Is it to be admitted that a Cabinet officer, even by direction of the President, shall be at liberty to refuse to transmit any papers to the Senate in executive session unless satisfied that the purpose for which the Senate desires them is one which in his opinion is wise and proper? Is it to be assumed by an executive officer or by the President that because a nomination is pending in the Senate of a person to fill an office that the Senate may not in executive session lawfully call for the papers filed in a Department touching the conduct of that office?

If Burnett had been confirmed and Duskin had been thereby removed, could the Senate be denied the production of the papers mentioned in the resolution? Even though called for in executive session who will so contend? Does the fact that the nomination was pending change the character of the papers or the Senate's power to demand, and its right to receive and inspect them?

If George M. Duskin were still in office discharging the duties and functions of the position, and the Senate in open session, or in executive session, should pass this resolution calling for those papers, would the Attorney-General or would the President hesitate for one moment to transmit them? Suppose the House of Representatives had passed the resolution, instead of the Senate, upon what theory could the Attorney-General, either of his own motion or upon the direction of the President, refuse to transmit them?

It has always been supposed that either the House of Representatives or the Senate had plenary power to investigate the Departments, had abundant authority to examine the Cabinet officers, even to bring them before the committee, with all papers in the office which would tend to show its condition, and the manner in which it had been conducted. It may be done in order to expose corruption; it may be done in order to uncover defects in the organization of a Department; it may be done in order that Congress obtain the information essential to the application of a corrective by new legislation. Such power in great fullness must of necessity exist, to be exercised under varied conditions and circumstances, and with many different purposes.

Is this not the attitude? The President, not denying that there may be circumstances under which either the House or the Senate would be entitled to such papers, to demand them and compel their production, assumes that they are wanted for a purpose which in his judgment is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate. If for any purpose within the power of the Senate it can direct under any circumstances the Attorney-General, or any other Cabinet officer, to transmit to the Senate papers touching the conduct of a particular office, then it is essential to the orderly conduct of the Government that the executive officer should assume that the papers are desired for a legitimate purpose. Or has it come to this, that the Senate or the House demanding the production of papers, which either may rightfully demand for some purpose, must go with Eastern salaam to the Department door, bound to disclose, first to the Attorney-General or the President, the precise purpose for which the papers are desired, under penalty of not receiving them at all?

How would it look, in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate asking that the Attorney-General or the Secretary of the Interior transmit to the Senate papers like these, in their very nature official, relating to the transaction of the public business, for the President to transmit to the Senate a message of this nature: "If you desire these papers you must first indicate to me the purpose for which you desire them, and if after having disclosed that purpose I think they are within your jurisdiction, and that the purpose to be subserved is a legitimate purpose, I shall transmit them; otherwise not?"

Would that be in effect any different from this response of the Attorney-General? Would it not be humiliating? Would it be anything less than a one-man government? Would it do anything less than enable the President of the United States to shut out at his will the sunlight of investigation from all the public offices? Must the Senate, must the House—because if he may require the performance of that precedent condition of the Senate he may of the House—first advise him of the purpose and submit to his judgment as to whether it is a legitimate one?

The resolution interprets itself, and relates upon its face to papers which no man can deny are in their nature public. The President by a message, as to the propriety of which I have nothing to say, tells us, not that there are no such papers on the files, but that there were other papers filed during that period which he considers private and confidential papers.

I shall spend little time in discussing the question in the abstract as to what constitute private and confidential papers in distinction from public papers to which the Senate or House has the right of inspection. I concede, of course, that there may addressed to the President, and doubtless are, many papers which are confidential. No one questions that; but I deny that papers addressed to the head of a Department or to the President of the United States touching the conduct of an officer, of such a character that they may be properly acted upon by either the head of the Department or the President, proper to be placed upon the files of the Department, relating to the transaction of the people's business in one of the people's offices, can by any magic become the private and confidential and secret papers of the President himself.

The President in his message says:

> They consist of letters and representations addressed to the Executive or intended for his inspection."

What of it? We all know that many of the charges formulated and transmitted from time to time by citizens against public officers are in the form of letters. They are transmitted, of course, for the inspection of the President. They are intended to attract his attention; they are intended by the writers to secure his action.

He says—

> They are voluntarily written—

Certainly. No one supposes they are involuntarily written; no one supposes they are written compulsorily. Does that make or tend to make them private and confidential?

He continues—> and presented by private citizens who are not in the least instigated thereto by any official invitation or at all subject to official control.

What of it? I have known several times of charges against public officers being sent by private citizens to the head of a Department and to the President of the United States. That is generally the case. Are they for that reason private and confidential? Certainly not. Must papers which relate to the conduct of the public business necessarily be signed by some official, or invited or instigated, to render them public and proper for the files, or to render them, if upon the files, open to the Senate or House.

The President says in his message (but the Attorney-General did not say in it his response) that—

> There had been no official papers or documents filed in his Department relating to the case within the period specified in the resolution.

It is not pretended that no papers were filed relating to the conduct of the office, and of the officer, during the period mentioned in the Senate resolution, but the claim is that they are not official.

The President says they are withheld "because I regard the papers and documents withheld and addressed to me or intended for my use and action purely unofficial and private, not infrequently confidential, and having reference to the performance of a duty exclusively mine. I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department, but as deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control. I suppose if I desired to take them into my custody I might do so with entire propriety, and if I saw fit to destroy them no one could complain."

It is idle to refine upon it, for while it may be difficult to define the boundary line between papers which are to be fairly considered public and those which are secret and private, no fair-minded man having occasion to pass upon the question can debate upon it for one moment. The President knows, any executive officer knows, when he looks at a paper and reads it, whether it belongs upon the public file or should find its way into the waste-basket. Any paper of such a character, especially if it contains charges considered worthy the action of the head of a Department or the Executive, placed upon the files by them, must be considered a public paper. If not, what papers are public? If a President chose to exercise to the extreme the power which is suggested by the present Executive, what papers would you find on the files? Only such as he chose to say were public and official. I submit to the Senate, I submit to the people, that the character of the paper must be determined not by the will of the Executive, but by the nature of the document itself, the subject to which it relates, the action it tends to evoke.

Senators on the other side claim, however, that this is not an investigating resolution. They say that it does not fairly express the purpose which the Senate had in view in adopting it. They say to us that we are fighting under cover. The minority of the Judiciary Committee say so in their report, and they guess at the real purpose, as they declare it, of the Senate. I have no right to speak for any Senator but myself, but speaking for myself, I want to say to the minority of the committee that they have guessed correctly. I have no desire so far as I am concerned to make any false issue here, or to cloud any real issue. When I voted for that resolution I had not heard any suggestion of misconduct upon the part of Duskin. I did not vote for it, I frankly say, upon the theory that we were proposing to investigate in an ordinary way that office; I voted for it under the theory which is reprobated by Senators on the other side, that in passing upon the question as to whether we would advise and consent to the removal of Duskin and the appointment of Burnett, we had a right under the law to all the information in the Department upon that subject. I assert now the proposition that the Senate has a right to obtain of a Cabinet officer upon demand, and of the President upon request, such information to enable it to act intelligently upon the question as to whether it will advise and consent to a proposed removal.

The Senators on the other side will not, I think, charge that the issue so far as I am concerned is not broad enough. Is the proposition sound in law? I want no other principle of law to guide me to a conclusion in favor of the right of the Senate to the information upon that theory than is found in the report submitted by the minority of the committee and the message which the President has seen fit to transmit. I call the attention of the Senate to the statement of the law in the report submitted by the minority of the Judiciary Committee. It is very guarded and very advisedly made, and is sufficiently broad and accurate for the purposes for which I desire to use it:

The minority admit, once for all, that any and every public document, paper, or record—

Note this, if you please—

on the files of any Department, or in the possession of the President, relating to any subject whatever over which either House of Congress has any grant of power, jurisdiction, or control under the Constitution, is subject to the call or inspection of either House for use in the exercise of its constitutional powers and jurisdiction. It is on this clearly-defined and well-founded constitutional principle that, wherever any power is lodged by the Constitution, all incidents follow such power that are necessary and proper to enable the custodian of it to carry it into execution. Whether the power is granted to Congress, or either House, or to the President, or any Department or officer of the Government, or to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle is as fundamental as the Constitution itself that all the necessary incidents of such grants accompany the grants and belong to and can be exercised by the custodians of such powers, jointly or severally, as they may be vested by the Constitution.

It is on the application and enforcement of this unquestioned rule of construction that either House of Congress has the right inherent in the power itself to direct the head of any Department or request the President to transmit any information in the knowledge of either—or any public or official papers or documents, or their contents, on the files or in the keeping of either, provided such papers or documents relate to subjects, matters, or things in the consideration of which the House making the call can use such information, papers, or documents in the exercise of any right, power, jurisdiction, or privilege granted to Congress, or either House, or to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Here, in a lawyer-like way, and in a bold way as lawyers ought to state their case, the minority, without shuffling or technicality, place the question upon this proposition: If the Senate of the United States has any jurisdiction over the subject-matter to which papers relate, or to which information in the hands of a Department officer or in the hands of the President relates, then they say unqualifiedly, and it would seem to be unmistakable law, the Senate has a right to the inspection of such documents and a right to elicit such information. The President, placing it upon a little different ground, recognizes the same principle, and in doing this he only follows the example of Washington in somewhat the same language upon the same subject, and of every Executive from Washington down, thus:

To the end that the service may be improved, the Senate is invited to the fullest scrutiny of the persons submitted to them for public office, in recognition of the constitutional power of that body to advise and consent to their appointment. I shall continue, as I have thus far done, to furnish, at the request of the confirming body, all the information I possess touching the fitness of the nominees placed before them for their action, both when they are proposed to fill vacancies and to take the place of suspended officials.

Why? Because under the Constitution the Senate is a factor in the act constituting, on the whole, the appointment of the officer; because, in the language of the minority of the committee, the Senate under the Constitution has jurisdiction over "the subject-matter." Hence it is that as to nominations sent to the Senate, information, upon the request of the Senate, is transmitted; not partial information, we are bound to assume. When the President says to us "I invite the fullest scrutiny," that means that he will give to the Senate, necessarily and essentially, the benefit of all information, formal or informal, which he has in his possession, whether on file or not, fairly and properly bearing upon the question as to which the Senate is to act. It does not mean that the President shall transmit to the Senate simply the papers in his custody or on the files in favor of the nominee. It does not mean that he shall make a partial presentation of the facts. It does not mean that the information shall be garbled. It means that in a full, fair way he shall give to the co-ordinate branch acting with him under the Constitution, in a jurisdiction which is conceded, all the information which he possesses essential to intelligent action upon the subject.

Now, sir, if it be true that the Senate of the United States exercises under the law the same function precisely in the matter of removals from office that it does as to the matter of appointments, then, upon the argument of Senators, upon the concession of the minority of the committee, upon the statement of the President, upon the law as it always has been, the Senate has a right, and it is not to be charged with partisanship for insisting upon that right, to ask that the information shall be transmitted to it to enable it intelligently to act upon the question before it.

This brings me to a brief consideration of the legal question as to whether the Senate has any part or function to perform with the President in the matter of removals from office, and I invite the attention of the Senate to that subject. I wish to consider it under the law, not as Mr. Madison thought the law ought to be; not as his excellency President Cleveland thinks the law ought to be; not as the Senators on the other side think the law ought to be; not as the Senator from Ohio thought the law ought to be; but as the law is. It seems very clear and plain; too plain, almost, for debate. Will Senators bear with me in a careful reading of this law, which I find bound for easy reference in the Manual of the Senate?

SEC. 1767. Every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed—

As to the language thus far read, construction has no office to perform, for language can not make plainer the intent of the framers—unless—

What?

unless sooner removed—

by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

I believe the practice has been almost from the beginning of the Government—it was so stated by Mr. Webster in 1835, and is so stated by Judge Story—that a removal from office ordinarily takes place by virtue of the appointment of a successor, which includes the confirmation. But this law recognizes apparently two methods of removal and provides distinctly and unqualifiedly that no man appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and qualified and having entered upon the duties of his office shall be removed in either of these ways except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There may be a direct proposition to remove, and that may be tendered to the Senate and it would be within the jurisdiction of the Senate to pass upon the question if so tendered. It may be—and the one does not differ in essence from the other—a proposition to remove by the confirmation of a successor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The law contemplates either mode. I thought for a time—and I am not sure yet as to what the true construction of the statute ought to be—that this law is confined to offices of definite term; but I will not stop to discuss that. I make this proposition, and I challenge the attention of Senators on the other side to it, that by that section it is clearly and unequivocally provided that one appointed to office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate can only be removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If the words "except as herein otherwise provided" were not in the statute, I apprehend no man would be found to dispute the accuracy and correctness of the proposition.

Now, what is "herein otherwise provided?" Is there anything in that law provided which weakens the force of section 1767?

SEC. 1768. During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized, in his discretion—to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the courts of the United States, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed, in his discretion, by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time.

To do what?

To my apprehension, one source of confusion in this debate is the constant confounding in the argument on the other side of the Chamber of the removal with the suspension. The President is authorized to "suspend." That is a word of well-settled signification. It is not technical. It is to receive the ordinary construction. It does not mean to remove. It is a lesser word than the word "remove." The power to suspend any civil officer does not involve the power to remove him. Does any lawyer dare to say that the word "suspend," as used in section 1768, has the same meaning as the word "remove," as used in the preceding section? To suspend is one thing; to remove is another. To suspend the writ of habeas corpus is one thing; to obliterate it and destroy it would be another. To suspend an officer is not to depose him. It is to interrupt his function. It is to cause his function to cease for a time. It is in its essence and in its nature temporary and not permanent. The word "suspend," if that were alone used in the section, would be sufficient to convey the full intent of the law; but in every line of the section Congress manifested an intent to make it clear, too clear for mistake, that the power given to the President was only the power to suspend an officer, leaving to the Senate unemasculated in any wise the power given by section 1767 to participate in the matter of removal. Let us proceed with an analysis of this section:

SEC. 1768. During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—

He can not even suspend except in a qualified way. The power of suspension even, here given, is limited by this language—

until the end of the next session of the Senate—

Does that look like the power of removal?—

and to designate—

Not to appoint. If any officer of the United States is appointed—that is, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate—his appointment is evidenced by a commission. This provides for no commission. It is a mere designation—nothing more, nothing less—of some suitable person subject to be removed in his discretion—by the designation of another to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time.

That is, during the suspension; until the end of the next session of the Senate, unless in the mean time by the action of the Senate the office has been filled by a new man. That is not all—

And the person so designated shall take the oath and give the bond required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall during the time he performs the duties of such officer—

That is, of the suspended officer not now habilitated with the power and functions of his office, but still an officer in the eye of the law, with his functions simply suspended—and shall, during the time he performs the duties of such officer, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of the office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended.

Why provide here with such care that no part of this salary should belong to the officer suspended if our friends on the other side are right in saying that there is no distinction in the law between the removal and suspension? Every clause and word and sentence in a statute, if I remember the canon of construction, is to be construed so that it shall mean something and not be insignificant or impute an absurdity to the men who framed it.

The President shall, within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not—

And then to make it doubly plain that where the officer had simply been suspended the word "vacancy" does not cover it, it adds—and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to the same session of the Senate for the office.

That is not all. Section 1769 declares—

The President is authorized to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate.

More than one of the Senators on the other side talked about the office being in abeyance because of the adjournment of the Senate. Let us see how careful Congress was to provide that the office should not be in abeyance because the officer was suspended.

SEC. 1769. The President is authorized to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate—

The language of the Constitution, I believe—

by reason of death or resignation or expiration of term of office, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter. And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is made to an office so vacant or temporarily filled during such next session of the Senate, the office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, until it is filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacaney in such office.

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Now, Mr. President it seems—and the argument might be elaborated almost without limit—impossible for any lawyer to sincerely argue that under this statute a man suspended from office is removed from office. A crucial test, however, of that question is this: Suppose a man to be suspended from office until the end of the next session of the Senate and some one designated to perform the functions in the mean time, and the Senate does not see fit by its advice and consent to allow that suspension to ripen into a removal. What then? Does the suspended officer go back into the office? If he does, of course it follows to the apprehension of any one that he was only suspended, not removed. Can there be any question about it under the law?

The term of office, if one may use that expression, of the officer designated to discharge the duties of the suspended officer is only until the end of the next session of the Senate. Now, suppose the Senate does not see fit during its session to advise and consent to the removal either as a direct proposition or by confirming a successor, what happens? The President exercises again if he chooses the power of suspension, does he not? He can not nominate a new man, using the word "nominate" in its proper sense within the meaning of the Constitution, because the Senate's session is at an end. All the power he has is to exercise again the power of suspension. Whom does he suspend? He does not suspend the "designated" officer, who served until the end of the session. He went out with the "end of the session." He suspends again the officer who had been suspended, and who under the law, by the end of the session without action upon the part of the Senate, had become rehabilitated with all the functions and duties of his office. Nothing, it seems to me, can be plainer than that.

Why, then, do the great lawyers on the other side of this Chamber—and I concede their ability and learning—constantly tell the Senate and tell the people that the power of suspension under this statute is the same thing precisely as the power of removal? But while it would seem that no authority is needed to show that the power given the President is only a power of suspension and that he can not remove without the action of the Senate, beyond the language of the law itself, there is evidence outside of the act itself that such was the understanding of its framers. I will not stop now to read to the Senate any extracts from speeches, but I recall to the memory of Senators the fact that Lyman Trumbull in 1869, then, I think, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, a great lawyer, now a great Democrat—in explaining to the Senate the effect of the act as reported by the conference committee, unequivocally stated that under the law the suspended officer would go back. Mr. Morton, who has been so many, many times quoted by the Senators on the other side, said the same thing. There was no misunderstanding upon it in that debate. There is no room for question about it, looking at the debate. Some said, as the distinguished Senator from Illinois, then a member of the House, said, that it was practically a removal. Why? Manifestly only because the person did not remain in the office if the President saw fit to exercise again the power of suspension.

The Supreme Court of the United States, if I can understand a legal decision, has expressly decided under this very act that the suspended officer, if before the end of the session he is not removed in one of the two ways indicated, either of which requires the advice and consent of the Senate, goes back to his office. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in the very able argument which he submitted the other day referred to this case, but I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate some language in it which the Senator from Iowa did not need to read, aad therefore omitted. I refer to the case of Embry vs. The United States (100 United States Reports, 680). This was the case:

April 20, 1867, the President duly commissioned A as deputy postmaster at Nashville, Tenn., for the term of four years, subject to the conditions prescribed by law, and May 5, 1869, under the act of April 5, 1869—

The act we are now considering—signed an order suspending him from office until the end of the next session of the Senate, and designating B to perform the duties of that office. A delivered the office to B May 27, 1869. The nomination of B was sent to the Senate at its next session, which terminated July 15, 1870, and on that date it was rejected. Pursuant to instructions from the Post-Office Department, A took possession of said office July 25, 1870. B, when holding the office, received the salary.

A took it into his head that he was in office all the time, and that, although suspended from the discharge of the functions of the office, he was nevertheless entitled to the salary, and sued the United States for the salary, which brought very clearly and necessarily before the court the construction and legal effect of this act of 1869 upon the point to which I am calling attention.

Now, will you allow me to read a word from this decision, if I may be permitted to appeal from my friend from West Virginia to the Supreme Court of the United States, upon this question?

When Embry was appointed, the President had the power to suspend him for cause.

That was before the act of 1869 had been passed giving him power to suspend at his discretion.

The law also provided that if suspended he should draw no salary so long as another person was performing his duties. While he was in office, further power of suspension was given the President, with a like provision as to pay. He was suspended. The Senate did not see fit to advise or consent to the appointment of another person in his place, and consequently, on July 15, 1870, when the next session of the Senate ended, he became entitled to enter again on the performance of the duties which pertained to his office.

That is not all. The court further say:

This he did on the 27th of July, but not before. His present claim rests not on any contract with the Government, either express or implied, but upon the act of Congress which provides for his salary. We so held in United States vs. McLean, 95 United States, 750. To adjudge in his favor would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one. Although he was lawfully in office—

That is, during the suspension—

he was not entitled to pay or emolument while not performing its duties, because of his suspension.

It is true his lawful suspension ended on the 15th of July, but he did not resume possession until ten days afterward. In the mean time the person designated for that purpose performed his duties. Under these circumstances the law gave the salary to the actual incumbent and not to him. The delay was an incident to the suspension, and does not seem to have been unreasonable. No more time elapsed than was necessary to give the proper notice and transfer the possession.

Will any lawyer say under this decision (and it seems so plain from the language of the statute as to need no decision whatever) that there is no distinction in the law between a suspension and a removal? Can it be said that if the Senate fails to act upon the question of removal and adjourns without action, that under that decision the suspended officer does not go back into office? Not at all. The suspended officer goes back into the office subject to a second, or a third, or a fourth, or a fifth exercise of the power of suspension, if the President sees fit.

Here seems to me to be one fatal weakness in the President's case. The Senator from West Virginia, to whom it is only a fair concession to say that he made an able and powerful presentation of the case from his standpoint, saw the danger-point but could not avoid it. He was too good a lawyer to seriously try. He said:

That man is suspended until the end of the next session of the Senate. The moment it ends, what matters it to you or to me whether by operation of law the suspended officer gets back or not? By an act of the President, his mere signature, he gets out again.

That is all the admission necessary to sustain my contention.

This brings me again to announce the proposition for which I contend, and that is that under the law as it stands the President has simply power to suspend an officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that he has no power under the law to remove such an officer except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If I am right about that, what becomes of this case? Senators on the other side admit, because they are compelled by the Constitution to admit, that the Senate is a factor in the appointment; that the Senate acts with the President by its advice and consent in confirming; and because of our jurisdiction over that subject the minority committee says, the President says, and everybody says that we are entitled to have transmitted not only the papers upon the files of the Department touching upon the question efficient to enable us to discharge in an intelligent way that duty of advice and consent, but beyond that the papers in the custody of the Department officer or in the possession of the President.

If it be true that we have the same power precisely as to removal that we have as to confirmation, how can the President of the United States treat as public, papers and documents relating to the nomination, and as private and personal property the same papers and documents, and letters and information relating to the removal? There is not such great magic in departmental files, nor is there so great magic in the use of words as to enable any lawyer to make that distinction, and to be able to say to us, "You are entitled to all these papers and information as a part of the appointing power, to enable you to act intelligently; you are equally a part of the removing power, but you are not entitled to have the papers and information of the same character to enable you to discharge that function."

Under the law of 1867 the power of suspension was not discretionary. The causes upon which it might be exercised were defined, and the President was required to communicate to the Senate within twenty days after the first day of its next meeting the fact of suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the Senate acted upon the matter of suspension simply, consenting or refusing to consent, as it might see fit. No name was sent, under that act, to the Senate for confirmation until the question of suspension had been passed upon and the removal thereby effected.

I know of no one who pretends to claim that such is the present state of the law upon the subject. Speaking for myself, I freely concede that the President is vested with the discretionary power of suspension. What limit there is, if any, outside of the letter of the law to the exercise of that power I do not care here to discuss.

I concede that it is not within the province of the Senate, under the law as it stands, to request or demand of the Executive that he communicate to the Senate the reasons for the exercise of this discretionary power. But when the President tenders to the Senate, by the nomination of one to take the place of a suspended officer, a proposal that the suspension shall by the action of the Senate become a removal, the Senate is entitled, upon request, to the benefit of the same measure of information, to enable it to act intelligently upon the question of removal, that it is to enable it to act intelligently upon the question of confirming a nomination. The fact that the President was guided in exercising the power of suspension by the same papers and information would not make the papers, documents, and information any less essential to intelligent action upon the part of the Senate, and certainly can not justly be urged against its right to such information.

The fact suggested by the President that some of the letters and papers had no influence, or may have had no influence, upon him in exercising the right of suspension would be a cogent argument perhaps if the Senate were seeking in any wise to sit in judgment upon his exercise of that right, but such is not the position of the Senate. The papers and information are not desired in order to enable the Senate to be able to decide whether the act of suspension was a blameworthy or praiseworthy act. They are wanted to enable the Senate to decide, not whether the President did what the Senate approves, but to enable the Senate to discharge intelligently, by aid of pertinent papers and information, a question within its jurisdiction, and devolved upon it by law, to wit, whether it shall advise and consent to a vacation of the office. In this view papers that might have been deemed entitled to little or no weight by the President, the Senate, equally intent upon discharging its duty, might consider entitled to weight.

Mr. President, when in the history of this country has a power been asserted so dangerous, so liable to be abused, so susceptible of being made subversive of the public good, as the power which the President substantially asserts, to treat papers relating to the conduct of a public office, and a fit foundation in any sense for his official action, as private, confidential papers, his own personal property, to be removed at his will, as he intimates, from the files of the Department, to be buried in the White House cellar, if he chooses, to be carted off to Buffalo if he pleases, because, forsooth, he acted upon them in exercising his power of suspension?

I take it you will hardly find a paper on the files of the Department touching the conduct of a man suspended from his office that would not somewhat affect and bear upon the question of his suspension, and which would not likewise enable the Senate to judge rightly of its duty in the matter of removal; and if the mere fact that the President acts upon the papers, makes them sacred and his own, shuts out the sunlight from a public office, prevents the Senate from discharging a duty devolved upon it by law, then it rests in the power of any Executive to lock the door upon the House of Representatives and upon the Senate, too, and to defeat any investigation of public servants. I, of course, do not intimate that the present Executive would so use that power if it existed. It is no part of my purpose to question his good faith. I am not called upon to do that, and I do not do it.

Let me remind Senators on the other side, as bearing upon the question of the power of the President to make papers private or public, as he chooses, and to remove or destroy at will, provided only he has acted upon them in suspending officers, a little quotation from Mr. Madison, which they so often make in demonstrating the unconstitutionality of this act. Mr. Madison said in the debate of 1789, as to the power of removal:

> Perhaps the great danger, as has been observed, of abuse in the executive power lies in the improper continuance of bad men in office. But the power we contend for will not enable him to do this; for if an unworthy man be continued in office by an unworthy President, the House of Representatives can at any time impeach him and the Senate can remove him, whether the President chooses or not.
> The danger then consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House, before the Senate, for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust.

Will you be kind enough to tell me how the House of Representatives could impeach a President for a wanton exercise of the power of removal, if it existed, a wanton exercise or refusal to exercise the power to remove, if it be the right of the President, at his will, any moment when he chooses to do it, to turn all the files of the office, except papers official in form, upon which he had acted in exercising a power exclusively in him, into private and confidential papers, and to thereby place them beyond reach of committees of either House of Congress? Exercise the power of impeachment and give the President the power at his will to destroy all evidence upon which alone that power could be exercised! It is idle; it can not be maintained for a moment.

Look at it in another view. To-day the circumstances are exceptional; to-day there is a Democratic administration, only a year of whose existence has passed, with a vast number of Republicans in office. It happens, therefore, that in every case in which the President suspends, he suspends a Republican official for the purpose of putting in a Democratic official. This fact, with the added fact that the majority in this body is Republican, enables Democratic Senators to say that in resisting the claim of the President, however high our motive, we are fighting to keep Republicans in office. But remember we are not making a precedent which is to last only until all Republican office-holders are deposed; we are not stating a question for to-day alone. Here is an issue made between the Senate of the United States and the President of the United States, and it is not of our making either, solemnly framed, conspicuous in its nature, which will outlive us.

Let us suppose, to show the result of this claim of the President, if allowed, that time has gone on, that Republican officials by the expiration of their terms and removals and death have been displaced, and the offices are filled with Democrats. Suppose out in Wisconsin John Smith writes a letter to the Postmaster-General or to the President, telling him that John Jones, the Democratic postmaster at some point at a given time robbed the mail. It is a private letter; it was "voluntarily written," as the President says; it was not invited by the Postmaster-General or by the President, but it is a letter which relates to the conduct of the public business; it is a letter which invokes the action of the executive department; it is a paper which, although in letter form and unofficial, makes a charge against the official character of a Democratic office-holder. It is investigated and the man is suspended. That happens not only in one State but in twenty States, as it will happen. You will have dishonest men in office, as all administrations have had and will have.

Suppose the Senate wants to ascertain by an investigation, independent, if you please, or not independent, of the question as to whether it will consent to the removal of that suspended man from office by confirming a new Democrat to the place what the conduct of the suspended official was. Under the new theory of administration you can not have that letter or others upon the same subject. Why? Because the President acted upon that in exercising the discretionary power of suspension, and you have nothing to do with that power.

I defy any Democratic Senator to show upon this doctrine what is to prevent the President of the United States, if he sees fit, from shutting out from the people all knowledge of dishonesty in the administration. If he suspends upon the charges of dishonesty, uninvited, sent in by citizens in form of letters or affidavits, then it is in his power to keep the people in ignorance of corruption by treating the papers as private and confidential because sent to him to guide him in exercising the power of suspension, which is his alone, and in that way he could protect his administration against the indignation of the people by keeping them in constant and utter ignorance of the truth.

No, no, that can not be the law. I submit to the Senate, I submit to the people, it never could have been intended that the business of a public trust should be private. It never was intended that the doctrine "public office is a public trust" should apply everywhere but to the Executive. It never could have been intended that the trustee of an express trust could, at his will, make private and his own property evidence of his transactions in the trust and keep out from the cestui que trust all knowledge; and yet that is what this doctrine now asserted amounts to.

What answer is made to the argument based upon the tenure-of-office act? We are told by the President of the United States that the tenure-of-office act is in a condition of "innocuous desuetude." Those words have become famous. The mention of them provokes a smile, but, upon my soul, there is in them, in that connection, nothing for me to smile at. This is a government of law. The law is around us all. No man is too great to be subject to it; no man is too low to be protected by it. I am sorry the President of the United States ever used those words. It is a dangerous time when the chief executive officer of a great nation, with an oath registered in Heaven "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," proclaims in a message to the Senate and to the people that a statute has fallen into harmless disuse. All over the United States to-day we hear mutterings of discontent. Some grave and thoughtful men turn blanched faces to the future. In more States than one large combinations of men have stopped the wheels of commerce. Long lines of railway have fallen into harmful disuse. If ever there was a time when all good citizens should inculcate respect for the law it is now. Tell me, if you please, how the people of the United States can be expected to yield cheerful and ready obedience to laws, some of which bear harshly upon them, it may be, when the first citizen of the Republic, himself charged with their execution above all other men, says to the world that a statute can harmlessly fall into disuse?

But the fidelity of the present Executive to law is not to be fairly judged by this standard. His conduct is better than his philosophy. As the Senator from Vermont said the other day, he has constantly executed this law. He not only sends us messages day after day suspending under its provisions, but without it he could not suspend an officer at all.

The Senator from West Virginia, whom I am glad to call my friend, gave utterance to a fit companion piece for this doctrine of "innocuous desuetude" when he talked the other day about the "practical repeal" of the statute. It was a strange sentence to come from a lawyer; and although he read it from a great author, I deny the possibility of it to a lawyer. A statute is repealed or it is not repealed. There is no middle ground. If it is repealed it is gone, it is dead; it is, except as to vested rights, as if it never had existed. If it is unrepealed it is alive, it is virile; and to say that it is "practically" repealed is to impeach whoever is charged with its execution.

Mr. President, what else is said in order to break the effect and force of this statute? Senators on the other side read at length from your speech in 1869 to show that the act was, in your opinion, an impracticable act and that it ought not to have been enacted. They read also from the speech of Mr. Morton and others. To what end? Is the question pending now before the Senate whether we shall repeal the statute or not? No, sir; the question is whether we shall obey it or not. When the time comes to act upon its repeal I may not be far from my friend from West Virginia, but I am sworn now, as the President is, and as we all are, to obey it. The Senate to whom you argued that the law would be impracticable in execution and ought not to be passed did not agree with you. It passed and is the law, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests, and says truly, when you were Secretary of the Treasury you obeyed it.

Now, that is not all. Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber take time to show that Senators on this side are inconsistent. What of it? I deny that it has been shown; but suppose it were true, that is not the question at issue between the President and the Senate.

Another thing these Senators say, and the President says it in his message, applying it even to papers confessedly official, is that the Senate, notwithstanding this act, has nothing whatever to do with the question of removal. He says the constitutionality of this act is not admitted. He asserts, and Senators assert, going back to 1789, that under the Constitution of the United States the President alone, untrammeled and unrestricted, has the power of removal from office. That is another strange proposition to come from an executive officer.

I think Senators on the other side say of us that in our position we are trenching upon the border line which the Constitution draws between the different departments. You say we are usurping the function, the constitutional prerogative of the Executive, and in the same breath that you berate us for usurping the constitutional prerogative of the Executive, the Executive, with your support, usurps the constitutional prerogative of the judiciary. Who gave the President of the United States or Senators on this floor the power to declare the tenure-of-office act unconstitutional? The Constitution created a tribunal for the purpose of settling such questions. It is the rule that even the highest courts will not hold an act unconstitutional unless its unconstitutionality be clear. The courts even resolve every doubt in favor of the law. It needs no argument to show that no executive officer can systematically disobey a statute upon the ground that in his opinion it is unconstitutional. It would be only one step from that to disobeying a statute because he deemed it to be inexpedient. No, Mr. President, it is a law upon the statute-book. We must obey it, and the President must obey it until the Supreme Court has decided it to be unconstitutional or until it shall have been repealed. There is no middle ground in harmony with the safety of the people or the principles of good government.

Moreover I deny that the tenure-of-office act is unconstitutional. I will not take much of the time of the Senate to discuss that question, but I desire, as it is the burden of the argument on the other side, to refer to it briefly.

The question as to where is lodged, under the Constitution, the power of removal from office is not a new one. It was debated early in the life of the Government. Three contentions—my friend from Maryland said "two"—have been maintained regarding it, each having able and distinguished men for its adherents.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I always yield with great pleasure.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I did not say there were only two contentions. I said there had been three views which had been theoretically entertained originally, but they finally settled down practically to two.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not intend, of course, to misstate him. I remembered only that portion of his speech in which he said, I think, that there were two and only two, and stated what they were, as I understood him.

One class argue that the power of removal from office is an executive power, that the Constitution vests the executive power in the President, that this power is unrestricted, with the single exception of the Senate's right to advise and consent to nominations and to act upon treaties, and that the exception is to be strictly construed, and his executive power therefore is unlimited in the matter of removals. This class also fortify the position by the clause which requires the President "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," insisting that he can not discharge that function unless he has power to discharge instanter unfaithful, and to appoint in their places, faithful officers. This ground was maintained by Mr. Madison in the great debate which took place in 1789 on the bill to create the Department of Foreign Affairs, now the Department of State, and it is only a fair tribute to the ability of Mr. Madison to say that in all the argument made in behalf of that contention since, no man has been able to add to that which he submitted.

Another contention has been that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment; that under the Constitution and by the practice of the Government one is removed only by the appointment and confirmation of a successor; that as the Senate is a part of the appointing power, it follows inevitably that no man appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate can be removed except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The third contention is that the Constitution is silent as to the power of removal; that it does not confer it expressly upon the President, or upon any other department of the Government; that it is not an executive function, and that the framers of the Constitution intentionally left that instrument silent upon the subject in order to leave to Congress the power to regulate by law the subject of removals from office. I shall not attempt abstract discussion upon the subject.

For a long time the practical exposition put upon the Constitution in 1789, by a vote of 34 to 20 in the House, and the casting vote of the Vice-President in the Senate, was considered to have settled the construction in favor of the unlimited power of removal by the President in the absence of statutory regulation. But strong arguments were repeatedly made against it, and it has always been considered that the fact that George Washington was the then President had much to do with the adoption of that construction. The diary of the debate kept by Mr. Maclay, a Senator from Pennsylvania, read to the Senate on the discussion of the tenure-of-office act in 1869 by Mr. EDMUNDS, clearly shows that the question was debated with great spirit on both sides, and that caucusing and appeals in behalf of the President had much to do with the result—a tie in the Senate as it was.

Pending the adoption of the Constitution its enemies asserted as an argument against it that it gave the President the power of removal, while its friends, including Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison, defended it by placing upon its provisions a different construction. In 1789 Mr. Madison had changed his mind. It is not recorded that Mr. Hamilton ever changed his.

The power was not exercised to any extent until 1826, and in the light of our times it was not exercised then.

In 1835 Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Webster attacked the construction as to power of removal, and denied absolutely, not all on the same ground, however, the binding effect of the practical exposition made by the act of 1789.

In 1818 Mr. Wirt, then Attorney-General, gave the first official opinion upon the subject coming from that office, that where Congress had not undertaken to restrict the tenure of office by the act creating the office, a commission would issue to run during the pleasure of the President, but if the tenure of the office was fixed by law, then the commission must conform to the law.

In 1826 a committee of the Senate, consisting of Mr. Benton, of Missouri; Mr. Macon, of North Carolina; Mr. Van Buren, of New York;

Mr. Dickerson, of New Jersey; Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky; Mr. White, of Tennessee; Mr. Holmes, of Maine; Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, and Mr. Findlay, of Pennsylvania, was appointed to take into consideration the question of restraining the power of the President over removals from office, and a report was made, in which they said among other things, "not being able to reform the Constitution as to the election of a President we must go to work upon his powers, and trim down these by statutory enactments, wherever it can be done by law," and for this purpose reported six bills, one to regulate the publication of the laws and public advertisements, another to secure in office faithful collectors and disbursers of the revenues, the first section of which vacated the commission of all officers, after a given date, charged with the collection and disbursement of the public moneys, who had failed to account for such moneys on or before the 30th day of December preceding; and the second section enacted that at the same time a nomination is made to fill a vacancy occasioned by the exercise of the President's power to remove from office the fact of the removal shall be stated to the Senate, with a report of the reasons for which such officers may have been removed. Also a bill to regulate the appointment of postmasters and a bill to prevent military and naval officers from being dismissed the service at the pleasure of the President, by inserting a clause in the commission of such officers that "it is to continue in force during good behavior," and "that no officer shall ever hereafter be dismissed the service except in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial or upon address to the President from the two Houses of Congress."

In 1830 Mr. Holmes introduced and discussed in the Senate a series of resolutions which contained, among other things, an assertion of the right of the Senate to inquire, and the duty of the President to inform them, when and for what cause any officer has been removed in the recess.

In 1835 Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Southard, Mr. Bibb, Mr. Webster, and Mr. King, of Georgia, were elected a committee to consider the subject of executive patronage, and the means of limiting it. That committee, with but one dissenting voice, reported a bill, which provided in its third section—

That in all nominations made by the President to the Senate to fill vacancies occasioned by removal from office the fact of the removal shall be stated to the Senate at the same time that the nomination is made, with a statement of the reasons for such removal.

This is the precise section reported by Mr. Benton in 1826, and passsd to a second reading in the Senate. After much discussion the bill passed the Senate—31 yeas, 16 nays.

Thus it will appear that the practical exposition of 1789 was from time to time repudiated by some of the ablest men the legislation of this country has ever known.

Mr. Clay said, in 1835, in the debate:

It is legislative authority; it creates the office, defines its duties and may prescribe its duration. I speak, of course, of the offices not created by the Constitution.

It would be well for our Democratic friends to bear in mind this distinction and to devote their argument a little more to the inferior officers which are left expressly to the jurisdiction of Congress; and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] calls my attention to the fact, which I had not known, that the Supreme Court of the United States at this very term has decided that Congress may regulate the term of the inferior officers and that the executive officers can not turn them out, which ought to be considered satisfactory authority in support of the tenure-of-office act, at least so far as it applies to offices not mentioned in the Constitution. I continue the quotation from Mr. Clay:

I speak, of course, of the offices not created by the Constitution, but the law, the office coming into existence by the will of Congress, the same will may provide how and in what manner the office and officer shall cease to exist. It may direct the conditions on which he shall hold the office, and when and how he shall be dismissed. Suppose the Constitution had omitted to prescribe the tenure of the judicial oath, could not Congress do it? But the Constitution has not fixed the tenure of any subordinate offices, and therefore Congress may supply the omission. It would be unreasonable to contend that although Congress in pursuance of the public good brings the offices and the officer into being and assigns their purposes, yet the President has a control over the officer which Congress can not reach and regulate.

The precedent of 1789 was established in the House of Representatives against the opinion of a large and able minority, and in the Senate by the casting vote of the Vice-President, John Adams. It is impossible to read the debate which it occasioned without being impressed with the conviction that the just confidence reposed in the Father of his Country, then at the head of the Government, had great if not decisive influence in establishing it. I think consequently that the decision of 1789, which implied a power of removal separate from the appointing power, was erroneous, but I think the decision of 1789 has been established and recognized by subsequent law as the settled construction of the Constitution, and that it is our duty to act upon the case accordingly for the present, without admitting that Congress may not, if necessity shall require, reverse the decision of 1789.

Mr. Clay concluded:

I think the Legislature possesses the power of regulating the condition, duration, qualification, and tenure of office in all cases where the Constitution has made no express provision upon the subject.

Daniel Webster, who used to be considered pretty good authority on the Constitution, says:

I think then, sir, that the power of appointment naturally and necessarily includes the power of removal, where no limitation is expressed, nor any tenure but that at will declared. The power of appointment being conferred on the President and Senate, I think the power of removal went along with it, and should have been regarded as part of it and exercised by the same hands. I think the Legislature possesses the power of regulating the condition, duration, qualification, and tenure of office in all cases where the Constitution has made no express provision on the subject. I am, therefore, of opinion that it is competent for Congress to decide by law, as one qualification of the tenure of office, that the incumbent shall remain in place till the President shall remove him for reasons to be stated in the Senate.

Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, one of the ablest lawyers of the country, spoke at length upon the question of removals, maintaining that the Constitution does not confer on the President alone the power of removal; that it is a matter of legislative provision, subject to be vested, modified, changed, or taken away at their will, and if it is not regulated at all by law it rests in the President, in conjunction with the Senate, as part of the appointing power.

Mr. Justice Story says, volume 2, section 1357, Story on the Constitution:

It is observable that the Constitution makes no mention of any power of removal by the Executive of any officers whatsoever. As, however, the tenure of office of no officers except those in a judicial department is by the Constitution provided to be during good behavior, it follows by irresistible inference that all others must hold their offices during pleasure, unless Congress shall have given some other duration to their office.

As far as Congress constitutionally possesses the power to regulate and delegate the appointment of inferior offices, so far they may prescribe the term of office, the manner in which and the person by whom the removal, as well as the appointment to office, shall be made. * * * The language of the Constitution is: That the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, &c. The power to nominate does not naturally or necessarily include the power to remove, and if the power to appoint does include it, then the latter belongs conjointly to the Executive and the Senate. In short, under such circumstances the removal takes place in virtue of the new appointment by mere operation of law. It results, and is not separable, from the appointment itself.

During the administration of President Washington few removals were made, and none without cause. Few were made in that of the first President, Adams. In that of President Jefferson the circle was greatly enlarged, but yet it was kept within narrow bounds, and with an express disclaimer of the right to remove for differences of opinion, or otherwise than for some clear public good. In the administrations of the subsequent Presidents, Madison, Monroe, and J. Q. Adams, a general moderation and forbearance were exercised, with the approbation of the country, and without disturbing the harmony of the system.

Mark this—

But at all events it will be a consolation to those who love the Union and honor a devotion to the patriotic discharge of duty, that in regard to inferior offices (which appellation probably includes ninety-nine out of a hundred of the lucrative offices in the Government) the remedy for any permanent abuse is still within the power of Congress by the simple expedient of requiring the consent of the Senate to removals in such cases.

This power was frequently asserted prior to 1867. On the 15th of May, 1820, Congress provided (volume 3, Statutes at Large, page 582) for the term of offices of certain officers therein named to be four years, but made them removable at pleasure. By the second section of the same act Congress removed from office all the officers therein commissioned, in providing a date when each commission should expire.

By the act of July 17, 1862, Congress provided (voulme 12, Statutes at Large, page 596)—

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to dismiss and discharge from the military service, either in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or volunteer force in the United States service, any officer for any cause which in his judgment either renders such officer unsuitable for, or whose dismissal would promote, the public service.

The commissions of such officers ran during the pleasure of the President, and yet Congress passed this act of authority, which it would not have done except as a legislative construction of the Constitution that he did not possess the authority without the enactment.

Congress, February 12, 1863 (12 Statutes at Large, 665), passed the act providing for the office of Comptroller of the Currency, which authorized the President, on the nomination of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint that officer, and declared that he should hold his office for the term of five years, unless sooner removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. By the act of June 3, 1864, there was added that he shall be removed upon reasons to be communicated to the Senate.

By the act of July 13, 1866, Congress enacted:

That no officer in the military or naval service shall in time of peace be dismissed from the service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect.

By the the law passed in 1873 (section 343 Revised Statutes) Congress authorized the appointment of the Director of the Mint, and provided that he may be removed by the President upon reasons to be communicated to the Senate, and President Cleveland—against whom I have no improper word to say—has removed the Director of the Mint and sent to the Senate, as in law bound to do, a message communicating his reasons for that removal.

Now, Mr. President, it is kindly suggested to me—and I avail myself of it, as I was ill when I commenced to talk and have been growing no better very rapidly—that I may stop here and conclude what little I have to say to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received this 18th day of March, 1886.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. DARGAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a correction of the Journal. The bill reported back by me yesterday from the Committee on Military Affairs (H. R. 1077) is stated to have been reported back without amendment. It was reported with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal was then approved.

HEATING APPARATUS IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect recommending an appropriation for heating apparatus in certain public buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BROOKLYN, N. Y.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect recommending an extension of limit of cost of the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y., and the purchase of additional land adjoining the site thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

He further announced that the President had approved and signed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Reuben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States.

FORT PORTER, BUFFALO, N. Y.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate for rebuilding Fort Porter, Buffalo, N. Y.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the letter of the Secretary of War referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this should properly go to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that under the rule of the House the Committee on Appropriations can not report on appropriation except in pursuance of exisiting law, and on an examination of this communication the Chair is not able to see that there is any law now in force authorizing the construction of this building.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Permit me to state, Mr. Speaker, that this estimate did not come in with the regular letter of appropriations from the Department owing to the fact that the report in this case was withheld for the purpose of securing some further data upon the subject. Otherwise it would have appeared in the regular estimates.

The SPEAKER. Is there a law authorizing the construction of the building?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I judge so. I ask unanimous consent that this be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

OREGON WAGON-ROAD COMPANIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information in relation to lands patented to the Oregon Central Military Wagon-road Company, the Willamette Valley and Cascade Mountain, and the Dalles Military Wagon-road Companies; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WORTHINGTON for this day, and to Mr. MORRILL for fifteen days, on account of important business.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill of the House No. 4232.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

Mr. BEACH. I object. It is not necessary to consume time in reading the bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman will allow the title of the bill to be read I am sure he will not object.

Mr. BEACH. My objection is not on account of the subject-matter of the bill, but is based entirely upon a different ground. I must maintain the objection.

Mr. NEGLEY. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon his objection. This is a bill to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va. The gentleman did not object on yesterday when a measure of far less importance was disposed of, a measure not pertaining to the soldiers of the country.

The SPEAKER. But still the gentleman has the right to object.

Mr. NEGLEY. Undoubtedly he has the right to object; but we do not honor his right.

REPORT ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Expenditures for Indians and the Yellowstone Park; 2,500 copies to be for the use of the House, and 500 to be for the use of the committee.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask consent to introduce some bills for reference merely.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5539 and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of James G. Martin.

Be it enacted, &c.—

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker, if a claim for the soldiers of the Union can not be considered, this claim, which is of a private nature, can not be considered either under the rule. I therefore object. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

CRUISE OF THE CORWIN.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, have considered the same, and respectfully recommend its adoption:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives the report of Capt. M. A. Healy, United States Revenue Marine, upon the cruise of the revenue-marine steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean in the year 1885, with all accompanying documents."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I present another privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, have duly considered the same, and report it back to the House with an amendment:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be permitted to print such arguments and statements and other matters pertaining to the coinage question as the committee may deem worthy of printing."

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing was as follows:

Add to the resolution the following proviso:

"Provided, That the cost of printing such arguments, statements, and other matters shall not exceed the sum of $500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the Senate concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the statistical abstract of the United States for the year 1885, having duly considered the same, instruct me to report it back to the House and recommend its passage. The estimated cost of printing the same is $1,361.60:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1885; of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives."

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like to have some information about the character of this work. I believe this is a publication which has not heretofore been published at the Printing Office.

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. SPRINGER. But not heretofore authorized to be published. I would like to know the extent of the work.

Mr. FARQUHAR. This is the general statistical abstract which has been in the hands of members for a week or two. It sets forth the whole of the statistical information prepared by the Bureau of Statistics under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, principally of exports and imports. It is valuable for use by the Committee on Ways and Means and other committees on expenditures.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then it has been published heretofore?

Mr. FARQUHAR. The usual number of copies have been printed this year, and this resolution provides for the printing of an additional number for the use of the House and Senate.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed to call the standing and select committees for reports.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 4744) to repeal section 3701 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SECTION 3336 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 444) to amend section 3336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXPORT TOBACCO MANUFACTORIES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2522) to authorize the establishment of export tobacco manufactories, and for drawback upon imported articles used in manufacturing exported tobacco; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 5369) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1597) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1119) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIABILITY OF VESSEL-OWNERS.

Mr. CALDWELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 3653) to limit the liability of owners of vessels; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LICENSING TOWING VESSELS.

Mr. DUNHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3037) relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICTS.

Mr. CLARDY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report, as a substitute for sundry bills referred to the committee, a bill authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that a substitute can not be reported for several bills. A substitute is an amendment, and can apply only to one bill. If the gentleman desires to report the bill he has sent up in lieu of the other bills, and will send those bills to the Clerk's desk so that they can be disposed of by the House, the Chair will entertain the report.

Mr. CLARDY. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the statement on this point on page 453 of the Digest.

The SPEAKER. There is no difficulty about reporting a substitute. A substitute is simply an amendment, and it is not in order to amend several bills by one proposition. But the gentleman can report this as a new bill.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to have read the paragraph in the Digest to which I refer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the practice of the House for many years, where a substitute is reported by a committee for a bill, or, as is often the case, for a number of bills, the substitute alone is considered, the original bill or bills remaining with the committee. The substitute is read the first and second time, is numbered, and becomes to all intents and purposes an original bill. This has been found much more convenient than the old practice when bills were not printed as now. Formerly it was the practice to treat a substitute as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, to wit, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the matter proposed or recommended by the committee in lieu of that referred to.

The SPEAKER. But the difficulty in the case now presented to the House is that the very title of the bill which the gentleman reports shows that it is a substitute for several bills, the numbers of which are given. Now all those bills can not possibly come up at once for consideration, and therefore a substitute for them all can not be adopted. If, as the Chair has already suggested, the gentleman will make this a separate and independent bill, the report will be correct. The title can be changed, and the bill will take the place, or rather will embrace the subjects, of all the bills in lieu of which it is reported.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. 6979) authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bills which I send to the Clerk's desk, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

While the bills and the accompanying letters do not show that the work is in continuation of improvements already in progress, the annual report of the Light-House Board does show that fact in all these cases.

On motion of Mr. CLARDY, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. 3579) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house at Harbor Island, North Carolina;

A bill (H. R. 3446) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house on Moose Peak, Mistake Island, west entrance to Bay of Fundy, Maine;

A bill (H. R. 3261) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house at Anclote Keys, Florida;

A bill (H. R. 3233) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house at Destruction Island, Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 243) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on Dog Island, Florida.

PROMOTION OF GRADUATES OF UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 223) to regulate the promotion of graduates of the United States Military Academy; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRON PIER AT FORTRESS MONROE, VA.

Mr. FINDLAY (by Mr. BRAGG), from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 6611) providing for the construction of an iron pier at Fortress Monroe, Va.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL P. SMALL.

Mr. FINDLAY (by Mr. BRAGG), from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4616) for the relief of Michael P. Small; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE K. OTIS.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (S. 699) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land warrants lost while in the possession of the officers of the Government; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSON, TENN.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3707, a bill (H. R. 6980) making an appropriation to complete the public building at Jackson, Tenn., and to reappropriate an unexpended balance therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill 3707 was, by unanimous consent, laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEWIS TYNS.

Mr. WOLFORD, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 247) granting a pension to Lewis Tyns; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES V. MESLER.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6182) for the relief of Charles V. Mesler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

A. A. THOMAS.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 391) for the relief of A. A. Thomas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AUGUSTUS D. SAYLOR.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4682) for the relief of A. D. Saylor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

OWNERS AND OFFICERS OF BRIG OLIVE FRANCES.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of the owners and officers of the brig Olive Frances and others on board said brig; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

S. T. MARSHALL.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 3922) for the relief of S. T. Marshall; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanping report ordered to be printed.

RICHARD C. RIDGWAY AND OTHERS.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1980) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. C. PHILLIPS.

Mr. SMALLS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 2394) for the relief of W. C. Phillips; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT YONKERS, N. Y.

Mr. COLE (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina), from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1606, a bill (H. R. 6981) to erect a public building at Yonkers, N. Y.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SECTION 304 REVISED STATUTES.

The call of committees for reports having been concluded,

Mr. TUCKER said: I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back with the amendments of the Senate the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The committee recommend that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask a conference.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate, which were non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, a conference with the Senate will be asked.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. TUCKER, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. STEWART of Vermont as the conferees on the part of the House.

INVESTIGATION OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees begins at three minutes past 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Claims. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5314) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to investigate private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration was referred to the Committee on Claims, and after careful consideration was reported back to the House with a unanimous recommendation that it do pass. The committee of this Congress that has under consideration private and domestic claims other than war claims against the Government is, I apprehend, no exception to the rule which has prevailed with reference to committees of previous Congresses that have had such claims under consideration; and, sir, the committee felt that they could hope for no greater measure of success than had followed the labors of the committees in previous Congresses. We were confronted in that committee and are now confronted with over fifteen hundred claims, running in amounts from a few dollars up to millions of dollars. Those claims are presented upon ex parte evidence. Many of the claims are entitled to consideration at the hands of the Government, while many are simply thrown into the Congressional lottery to take their chances, to see whether they will draw a prize in the manner in which these matters are being disposed of by Congressional action on ex parte evidence. The just and unjust stand an equal chance.

At the last Congress there were referred to the Committee on Claims, if my memory serves me aright, nine hundred and thirteen claims. Of those, one hundred and sixty-three were reported back to the House, and only twelve ever received the concurrent action of both branches of Congress so as to become laws. The aggregate amount appropriated in all bills of a private nature that passed the last Congress was $24,844.09. Congress is, it is safe to say, the most expensive, as well as the most dilatory, tribunal before which these claims can be investigated. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the Forty-fifth Congress used this language:

It is hardly too much to say that a person with a just claim upon Congress might almost as well abandon it as pursue it, and that no one with an unjust claim, if only plausible, persistent, and needy, need be without some hope of success.

The evils, as well as the folly, of attempting, or rather pretending, to adjudicate private and domestic claims by Congressional investigation is much more apparent now than in the Forty-fifth Congress.

It would be safe, sir, to state that the time consumed in the consideration of some one of these claims costs the Government more than the entire amount appropriated to pay all the claims which are finally allowed by the Government in any session. The question that presents itself to a gentleman on that Committee on Claims and should present itself to any member of Congress is, is it the policy of this Government to pay its just claims and to see that unjust claims shall not be paid, or is it the policy of the Government to keep the word of promise to the ear of the citizen while we most effectually break it to his hope?

I received yesterday a letter which illustrates the opinion of a constituent of a member of this House at home. He writes of a bill which has been introduced by his Representative and says: "My friend, Hon. ——, has introduced a bill, and by an industrious effort has secured its reading a first and second time and had it referred to your committee." [Laughter.] He evidently felt his Representative in Congress was looking after his interest, and that a man who could secure the reading of the bill twice and have it referred to a committee had it on the highway to its speedy allowance. If he had been in the Committee on Claims, if he had seen the wrecks strewed along the highways and byways of Congress of the men who had pursued their honest claims against the Government until relieved by death, leaving their claims against the United States as a legacy to their children—for if a man does not belong to the favored few an ordinary lifetime is far too short to get a claim through Congress—the chances are that my friend who had his bill read twice and referred to the committee if now young will be old before it ever gets to the third reading. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. You will find the same wrecks upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. It is suggested also that the Private Calendar is filled with the same wrecks. That is true. Then the bills that are reported are permitted to sleep the sleep that knows no waking. The position of the Committee on Claims is simply this: We come before Congress with this bill; we say if it is the prerogative of Congress to entertain these claims, let it entertain them in good faith. Let us deal honestly with claimants. I do not use too strong an expression on the part of men having just demands against the Government.

To meet this, sir, the bill under consideration does not go as far as many members might wish it to go. I am willing to concede possibly I would be willing to go further myself than the provisions of this bill go. But, sir, your committee felt this bill was a step in the right direction, and if a conservative measure of this kind were presented we felt it would receive the approval not only of this House, but of the other branch of Congress, and become a law. It provides, in short, for referring all private and domestic claims, other than war claims, against the Government to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact in each case. And when that finding is made it shall be reported back to Congress by the court for appropriate action.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Is not that the law now?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I thank the gentleman from Vermont for asking me the question whether that is not the law now. I say no, it is not; and I say so understandingly. Under section 1 of the Bowman act there is provision made for reference to the Court of Claims by the committee. The Bowman law is entitled "An act to provide for the relief of Congress," but the only relief granted by the act itself especially is in the title of the act. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is so.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The gentleman must know, and if there is any controversy on the question I have the law here, that the statute of limitations applies to every matter referred to the Court of Claims. Under section 1059 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress, upon any regulation of an Executive Department, and upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the Government of the United States, as well as all claims which may be referred to the court by either House of Congress. The Bowman act gives any committee of Congress before which a claim is pending which involves the investigation and determination of facts authority to refer the claim to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact, but prohibits the court from entering any judgment thereon.

Yet, sir, as the honorable gentleman must know, by the second section of the Bowman act the Court of Claims can not consider any claim against the United States which is barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States. Section 1069 Revised Statutes forever bars any claim against the United States in the Court of Claims, unless the petition setting forth a statement thereof is filed in the court within six years after the claim first accrued, except in cases in which the claimant comes within some of the disabilities enumerated in the statute; then the limitation is three years after the disability is removed, provided that the claim accrued during the disability of the claimant. This embraces married women, persons beyond seas, minors, &c.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. Is not the gentleman from Missouri mistaken as to the statute of limitations barring all these claims?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow him to proceed with his remarks, as I would like to ask him a single question.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield five minutes longer to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, let me call his attention to 19 Court of Claims, in Ford, administrator, against the United States, page 519. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

The provision of the Bowman act, that this court shall not have jurisdiction of any claim which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law is not confined to a law of limitation or to any express law barring the claim in express terms, but extends to every law which has the effect of barring it.

And in that same decision the court say that the statute of limitations applies to all cases which are referred for the mere finding of fact, &c. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STONE] will concede that I have not overstated the proposition.

Now, sir, the provisions of this bill have in effect repealed every statute of limitation—every statute of limitation with reference to the presentation of a private and domestic claim other than war claims against the Government save this, that if the claimant does not file his petition in the Court of Claims within two years after the claim shall have been referred by Congress or by the committee to the Court of Claims then the claim shall be forever barred.

Do you wish to repeal the statute of limitation? Your actions would indicate that you do. Every member on this floor by his act in introducing bills for the relief of private individuals (and you only do so when the claimant has no standing in court because of the statute of limitation, or unless it be a claim that is addressed solely to the discretion of Congress)—by our action in such cases we establish the fact that we are in favor of removing the bar of the statute of limitation in individual cases; that is, in every case when asked by a constituent to introduce a bill for his relief we do so.

I submit that the Congress of the United States, assembled for legislative purposes, is hardly a proper body for the investigation of disputed facts necessary to a proper determination of these private claims. Let the facts be investigated by a judicial tribunal, where in each case they may be determined in accordance with the rules of evidence, where witnesses may be examined and cross-examined, so that the honest claimant may have that which belongs to him, and thus insure the rejection of fraudulent claims.

This bill provides further, that at the adjournment of each Congress the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall refer all private and domestic claims pending which have not been referred by the respective committees to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact the same as others referred to it by the committee, and that a record shall be kept of such claims so referred, which shall be entered in the Journals of the respective Houses and also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

And if the claims so referred when reported back to Congress by the court are not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, they shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

It is safe to say that not 25 per cent. of the private claims that are thrown into the Congressional hopper—where the chaff is not at all times separated from the grain—would ever enter their appearance for a judicial investigation in a court. Those claims that are meritorious will be so declared. They will come back to Congress with a finding of fact upon which we can act intelligently and justly; that is, do even and exact justice to the claimant and the Government.

If it is the policy of Congress to have the facts in each claim before it before passing upon the claim, in order that the citizen, in a reasonable time, may be paid that to which he is honestly entitled, and to insure the rejection of claims without merit, then Congress should, in the opinion of your committee, pass this bill. But if it is the purpose to continue these private claims from generation to generation, obstructing general legislation, then there should be no change; for the mind of man would be at a loss to suggest any other mode of procedure for passing upon private claims against the Government under the practical workings of which so little can be accomplished at so great an expense as the present system.

It is fair to assume that Congress is not afraid to trust the judiciary to ascertain the facts and to declare the conclusions of law as to such facts in any controversy, whether it be one between citizens or between a citizen and the United States. It is to be regretted that this Republic of ours should refuse to open its courts to any of its citizens having just demands against the Government. The evils, delays, and injustice of examining and passing upon private claims resulted in the establishment of the Court of Claims to repress a mischief and to advance a remedy. Yet many private and domestic claims can not be prosecuted in that court, they being barred by the statute of limitations. A just claim of the citizen against the Government should not be discharged by time; it should be paid regardless of its age. The claimant should be given the privilege of going into such court as the Congress shall designate, at least to establish fully the facts upon which he bases the claim or demand.

This language I used in the report on this bill with the unanimous approval of every member of the Committee on Claims.

In the Forty-fifth Congress a committee of the House in reporting upon the evils resulting from Congress attempting to investigate these private claims used the following language:

How numerous these cases have become may be seen from the fact that while from the Twenty-eighth to the Thirtieth Congress the private bills and petitions of all kinds averaged only 525 in a Congress—of which the great body belonged to the class for which judicial tribunals have been since established—of late years the number of private bills alone belonging to the exceptional classes, relief for which rests in the discretion of Congress, amount in a session of Congress to about 2,500, or about five for each day Congress is in session. The gross injustice this necessarily occasions to meritorious claimants, and the inducement it offers for the presentation and pressure of groundless and unworthy claims is obvious.

Then it was thought, and justly so, that the fact that 2,500 private bills were introduced into one session of Congress made it the obvious duty of that body to devise some other means for their determination. That duty is more apparent now than then. At this session of Congress there have been introduced 7,885 bills, more than two-thirds of which are for private claims. It is safe to estimate that before adjournment the number will reach fully 10,000—more than 7,000 of which will ask for private legislation. The following table will show the number of bills and joint resolutions introduced into each Congress since 1861:

Congress.	Senate bills.	Senate resolutions.	House bills.	House resolutions.	Total.
Thirty-seventh Congress	433	137	613	158	1,341
Thirty-eighth Congress	485	128	813	182	1,608
Thirty-ninth Congress	635	184	1,234	305	2,358
Fortieth Congress	980	244	2,023	476	3,723
Forty-first Congress	1,375	326	3,091	522	5,314
Forty-second Congress	1,652	15	4,073	592	6,332
Forty-third Congress	1,362	20	4,891	162	6,435
Forty-fourth Congress	1,293	33	4,708	196	6,230
Forty-fifth Congress	1,865	72	6,549	250	8,736
Forty-sixth Congress	2,224	167	7,257	419	10,067
Forty-seventh Congress	2,509	143	7,685	367	10,704
Forty-eighth Congress	2,671	135	8,290	347	11,443

The cost of printing bills and joint resolutions of Congress from 1862 to 1885, both inclusive, is $641,515.52. For this session of the Forty-ninth Congress the cost is estimated by the Public Printer at $100,000. Two-thirds of these amounts are for printing bills of a private nature. The cost of printing the bills referred to the Committee of Claims of the House in the last Congress was $8,000, while only twelve bills so referred ever passed Congress, for claims amounting in the aggregate to $24,844.09. Many of the claims before the Committee on Claims of this House have been before almost every Congress for the last quarter of a century; a few did service in the First Congress and are now being prosecuted by the great-grandchildren of the original claimants. From Congress to Congress the Government has paid more for printing the bills and reports in many cases than the claims amount to.

This bill contains a provision that after the reference of claims to the court they shall not again be considered by either House of Congress except for the purpose of reference until they are reported upon by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Is that constitutional?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I presumed that question would be asked. In answer, Mr. Speaker, to that I will state that the Judiciary Committee of this House reported an exactly similar bill. Mr. O'Connor, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, in the Forty-sixth Congress, I think—the report will show—made a similar report. In answer to the gentlemen's question, Is that constitutional? I take it for granted that every member on this floor understands that under the Constitution the right of petition is guaranteed. All must know that the humblest citizen of the country has the right to send his petition to Congress, and that every member of Congress has the right to rise in his place and introduce a bill to grant relief; and that nothing short of an express amendment to the Constitution could prevent it.

But, sir, I apprehend also that it is within the power of this Congress at least to enact a general law, that when a petition covering the claim or a class of claims comes before Congress it may refer that claim or that class to a court for the ascertainment of facts before its consideration for allowance; or Congress may take the claim and make a special exception to the general law, as has been done in special acts in military matters during this Congress.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. It would have no binding effect upon a succeeding Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I hope I will be allowed a little additional time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will allow the gentleman a few minutes longer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to ask a question, or make a suggestion rather, to which I would like to have an answer from some member of the Committee on Claims. I would like to ask in the first place if it is the opinion of this committee that there is any class of claims for which there is not now an adequate remedy for their adjudication and payment where there is a legal liability on the part of the Government? My understanding is that practically all of the claims that come to Congress are founded upon a basis of real equity, upon which the claimants ask for relief as a matter of course from Congress and from the Government; but I did not or do not understand that there is any very considerable number of claims turned away without remedy now where there is a legal liability on the part of the Government to pay them.

Mr. LONG. Does not the gentleman from New York think it worth while to provide for the claims where there is not a legal remedy?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is very questionable——

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I will answer his question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Permit me first to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. What I would say is this: that it is perhaps very questionable whether the Government could afford to have all the claims which may be pending referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LONG. For the ascertainment of facts.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; for the ascertainment of facts. I fancy Congress would then have to constitute itself into a court for the adjudication of claims.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The gentlemen from New York will now permit me to answer the question addressed to me. I will read section 1069 of the Revised Statutes:

> Every claim against the United States, cognizable by the Court of Claims, shall be forever barred unless the petition setting forth a statement thereof is filed in the court or transmitted to it by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as provided by law, within six years after the claim first accrued.

Then I say to the gentleman every claim founded on contract, express or implied, or an act of Congress—every claim, however meritorious it may be—unless it be presented to the Court of Claims within six years after it has accrued, is forever barred. And I say to the gentleman further, that under the rules which have been adopted by the Court of Claims the question as to the limitation is a jurisdictional fact. In the cases before the Court of Claims the party must show in his petition that his claim accrued within six years prior to the filing of his petition. If he does not so show, upon motion he is compelled to make his petition or declaration more specific, and show the time when the claim accrued. If it accrued more than six years before the filing of the petition, then, under the rules, it must be dismissed.

Now, about the Bowman act. I do not know how the limitation found its way into that act. It must have been put there for a purpose, and that purpose would seem to have been to defeat the very objects intended to be accomplished by the act. I read from section 2 of the Bowman act:

> Nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by the provisions of any law of the United States.

Look at the absurdity of this provision. It provides for the accounting of certain claims for supplies, &c., furnished the military forces of the United States during the late war. The act is passed nearly eighteen years after the close of that war—that is, after the demand accrued. How could such a claim be presented under this act, passed in 1883, within six years after the claim accrued? The insertion of this statute of limitations in the Bowman act by way of amendment defeated, as I apprehend, the very object intended by its framer.

I concur in the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, we should provide for the payment of claims where now there is no legal remedy. It should not be the purpose of this Government to pay its debts with time. Time should not be made the paymaster of the Government. Why not let the court make a finding of fact in all these cases? It is not possible that Congress is unwilling to trust the judiciary of the nation even to the extent of an ascertainment of the facts in these cases.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me make one other suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri. So far as the claims are concerned that are referred to the Court of Claims, the statute of limitations applies. So far as concerns all claims which are founded on contract and for the payment of which an appropriation has been made, those are all audited by the several auditing officers——

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. There is no question about that.

Mr. HISCOCK. And no statute of limitations whatever applies to them. Now, then, what I would like to know is this: What special claims there are that are barred by that statute of limitations and that go to the Court of Claims that the auditing officers of the Government do not have power to pass upon independent and regardless of that statute.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I am most unfortunate in my attempt to express my ideas. If I had made myself clear the gentleman from New York would not have so far misunderstood what I have said. I have said that all claims that are founded upon contract, express or implied, or that rest upon an act of Congress, that are not presented to the court in six years from the time they accrued—all such, however just or meritorious they may be, are barred by the statute of limitations, and of those there are thousands, many of which you have referred to the Committee on Claims, and they are being considered. Fifteen members have been assigned to pass upon the merits of those claims and report them back to Congress. For what purpose? Presumably for allowance, if meritorious, without regard to the statute of limitations. Are we dealing honestly by those claimants? Should the Government not pay every honest demand against it without regard to its age? I for one think it should. But under the present method of Congressional investigation of these claims they will never be paid. Let us provide a tribunal in which the claimant may judicially establish the facts of the justness of his claim.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman misunderstands me.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I decline to yield further for the present. I will yield the floor in a moment. I wish to call the attention of the House to one fact. In the last Congress the number of these private claims was a crying evil.

Mr. LONG. You give the United States a chance to defend against these claims.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Yes; as is suggested to me, we give the United States a chance to oppose these claims. If these cases go to the Court of Claims the witnesses may be brought into court. It is made the duty of the Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, to appear in defense of the Government; whereas now it is no reflection on any member of Congress or any member of a committee to say that too often in the allowance of these claims kissing goes by favor.

I have said that Congress is not only the most expensive, but at the same time the most dilatory, tribunal before which claims against the Government that demand an investigation of fact could be determined. Here is a body of men of 409 members—Senators, Representatives, and Delegates—each getting a salary of $5,000 a year, sitting as a court, spending much time over claims involving small amounts. Yet the expense of the Congressional tribunal might be overlooked if the claims were passed upon. It is safe to say that there are now more claims pending before the Committee on Claims than will be disposed of by Congress in the next quarter of a century, if we may judge the future by the past. I am authorized to say for the Committee on Claims that they are deeply impressed with the necessity of legislation in the direction indicated by the bill under consideration.

The accumulation of private claims has been so great within the last twenty-five years as to burden several of the committees of Congress and to retard action upon a great proportion of the claims referred, at the same time compelling members, elected to participate in the examination and discussion of national subjects, to devote their time to the investigation of these private claims. The committee is confronted with the fact that, work as it may in the ascertainment of the facts upon which the claimant seeks redress, it is beyond its power to give anything like a satisfactory examination to but a very small portion of the claims before it. It is also aware of the further fact that but a few of the cases reported will ever receive the consideration of Congress. The liquidation of private claims by Congress time has demonstrated to be expensive as well as dilatory. It should be the wish of every honest claimant, as well as that of the Government, to have the facts in every claim ascertained by a court after a thorough examination of the witnesses for and against the claims. When the facts are so found, then, and not till then, can Congress satisfactorily or expeditiously pass on the private and domestic claims now pending before this committee.

Although the committee can not suppose that the accompanying bill is the best possible substitute for the present very objectionable system of passing upon claims referred to it, yet it believes that this bill will furnish a remedy for many of the evils complained of; it is, at least, a step in the right direction. The bill may be obnoxious to the objection that it does not go far enough in affording a remedy to claimants. However true that may be, certain it is that, under its provisions, the facts will be ascertained under due forms of law, so as to protect the interests of all concerned; that if it becomes a law, and its provisions are strictly adhered to by Congress, it will afford relief now practically denied to those having claims against the Government, and will give members more time to attend to general legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], who desires to move an amendment with regard to war claims. While I yield for that, I do not yield to admit the amendment, unless the House shall vote down the previous question hereafter when the motion for that purpose is made.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, when this bill was called up, I gave notice that I should at the proper time move to amend it by striking out of line 5 the words "other than war claims," and by making the same amendment at every other place where those words occur in the bill. I am in favor of the general object of this bill. I concur in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has so well said as to the duty of this Government to its citizens and the duty of this Congress in its legislation. So fully do I concur with him, that I feel it to be absolutely necessary, if we desire to accomplish anything at all by this bill, that the amendment which I propose shall be made.

The object of the bill is to save Congress from the exercise of judicial power. If these words, "other than war claims," are not struck out, no bill can go before the Court of Claims until Congress has passed upon it judicially to determine whether it is or is not a war claim. A large mass of all the claims that come before Congress arise out of the war in some shape or other. What does the gentleman mean by "war claims?" Does he mean claims for the destruction of property by the Army? Does he mean claims for property purchased for the use of the Army but not paid for? Does he mean something done by the citizen for the benefit of the Army or for the benefit of the Government during the war? What class of war claims does he refer to in this bill? The bill, if this provision be left in it, will be utterly incapable of being executed. But there are still greater objections to it. If it is right that the people of this country should be paid by the Government what is honestly due them, why should not the man who has a just "war claim" receive his pay as well as one who has a claim of some other character? Shall not the man who furnished from his stock of provisions quartermaster or commissary stores for the support of the Army receive compensation as well as he who has a claim for a rebate of the tax on tobacco, on whisky, or on some other commodity? If it is right that one class of claims should be paid, why should not all just claims be paid? If it is dishonest to refuse to pay one class of honest claims, why is it not dishonest to refuse to pay all claims that are founded in justice?

Why, sir, take this very Congress; the claims classified as "war claims" that have been introduced in this House number 2,235, while those classed as simply "claims" number only 1,519. The claims for pensions referred to the Committee on Pensions are only 309 in number, while those referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions number 2,266. So that the claims arising from the war, and which may be included under the term "war claims," are as great in number as the pension bills introduced at this session. Yet gentlemen undertake to say that they are doing justice to the people of the country by a bill which would exclude from a hearing a large majority of all the claims against the Government. Why is this? Is it because the bulk of these claims are in one section of the country? Is it possible that the bill is drawn in this form in order that the relief granted under it shall go to the people of one section and be denied to the people of another? I am not one of those who believe that the Government of this country is like a captured city, to be "looted" by those who have captured it. I believe this is a great Government for the people and for all the people, and therefore that a bill of this sort, undertaking to guarantee justice to the people, should guarantee it to every man in every section of the country. If a man in a Southern State who has a war claim has not such a claim as he can establish before the court under the law, why he will be turned out of court. If he has such a claim and is entitled to recover, the court will allow his claim; and no man who desires to do justice should have any objection to that.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend a moment while the House receives a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon; and

A bill (S. 1127) to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1885, granting a pension to Sarah Hague.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the House amendments numbered 1 and 5 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and insisted upon their amendments numbered 2, 6, and 7 to said bill, disagreed to by the House.

INVESTIGATION OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PETTIBONE. This Congress presents the same spectacle which has been presented by every Congress of which I have been a member. I know that the time of members is taken up continually by urgent demands on the part of their constituents, by petitions and proofs sent up here in immense quantities, and they are compelled, out of a sense of justice and right, to introduce bills for the relief of A, B, or C.

Now, I find in this proposed bill the expression "other than war claims." I desire to have that phrase stricken out, believing that all just claims against this Government ought to stand upon the same foundation. If the Government owes the debt, if the party has done something for the Government or furnished property to the Government, and it was right that the service should have been rendered or the articles furnished, the Government ought not to cut out his claim for compensation.

But what do you mean by this expression "war claims?" Claims of what war? The Revolutionary war? The war of 1812? The war with the Creek Indians? The war with Mexico? Or the great civil war? There is nothing here to determine this question. But take as an illustration a case that came up the other day. A case, involving a contract between the quartermaster at Nashville and a private citizen, went to the War Claims Committee, and the vital question turned out to be, was it a contract or not? The Quartermaster's Department said that they could not settle the matter as it stood; and this House passed the bill. It seems to me that this distinction is simply a means "how not to do it." All claimants having legitimate claims against the Government ought to have the same tribunal where they can present the facts, where the facts may be found and reported to this body, which is manifestly incompetent to make such investigations.

A MEMBER. But the claimant may be disloyal.

Mr. PETTIBONE. The question of loyalty will come up necessarily. I do not want to have any man paid who was not loyal.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a little premature for the House to consider this bill when a bill more comprehensive in its provisions was reported yesterday by the Judiciary Committee. I am not sensitive upon the question of jurisdiction as between these two committees; but the House will remember that at an early period of the session the question came before the House whether the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Claims should take jurisdiction of this general subject, and the House decided that the Judiciary Committee should do so. We have taken all the bills, including that of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, and have reported a comprehensive measure on the subject, which I am sorry to say is not yet printed, and can not now be laid before the House. I will, however, state succintly what that bill provides.

It provides in reference to all claims under the Bowman act which are referred to the Court of Claims, if the court finds that under the provisions of existing law, or of the new bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, it has jurisdiction to render judgment, the court shall render judgment in the case and not send it back to Congress. So that this measure goes further than the bill before the House in providing a remedy for the claimant. It enables the court, when it finds it has jurisdiction of the claim, to render judgment without sending the matter back to Congress.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Do you propose to repeal the statute of limitations?

Mr. TUCKER. We do to this extent: We provide in the bill a statute of limitations as to all claims arising more than six years prior to the passage of the act; so that any claim originating within six years immediately preceding the passage of the act will come within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims or the district or circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Is it not a fact that all such claims arising within the last six years have now a standing in court if they are founded on contract, express or implied, or upon an act of Congress?

Mr. TUCKER. But the gentleman will allow me to say the provisions of our bill go away beyond the present jurisdiction. The present jurisdiction of the Court of Claims embraces all matters arising under an act of Congress, or a regulation of an Executive Department, or upon contracts express or implied, and all other matters referred to the Court of Claims by Congress. We go further, and propose that any claim of a citizen under the Constitution of the United States, or under a law of Congress, or under a regulation of an Executive Department, or upon any contract express or implied, or for damages liquidated or unliquidated depending on claims redress for which might be found against the United States in any court of law, equity, or admiralty, shall be within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and shall also be within the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States, the jurisdiction of the latter tribunals as to all amounts up to $10,000 being concurrent with that of the Court of Claims. So that under the bill which we propose the citizen may sue for all claims up to $10,000 either in the district or circuit court of the United States or in the Court of Claims and have his claim adjudicated, while for all claims beyond that amount he may sue in the Court of Claims.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. What provision does the bill of the gentleman make for claims more than six years old?

Mr. TUCKER. The provision of the bill is that the jurisdiction provided shall not extend to any cause of action which occurred more than six years before the passage of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. What do you do with those cases which have been pending in Congress?

Mr. TUCKER. As to all those cases, Congress may act upon them and refer them to the court.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. One more question. If the bill now before the House should pass—and the gentleman enters no protest against it, except on the ground that it is not broad enough—if it should pass, and the gentleman's bill also pass, the one would not conflict with the other?

Mr. TUCKER. I will come to that point in a moment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have yielded to others for debate all the time I can spare; I must now resume the floor myself.

Mr. RANDALL. This is an important bill, and we ought to be allowed to understand it fully.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not wish the whole discussion to be on one side. I desire that the friends of the bill should be heard.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I was going to say to the House that I do not wish to be put in an unfriendly attitude to the bill, because I am in sympathy with its purposes. But would it not be better to postpone the consideration of this bill until we can fix a time for the consideration of the larger bill, so that whatever is defective in the larger may be cured and supplemented by the one now pending? I wish, therefore, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not yield to any motion. If he will pardon me, I think I can explain in five minutes' time that the bill now before the House and that reported by the Judiciary Committee do not conflict in the slightest degree, and that the two bills can pass, and pass at this session; that they refer not only to different subject-matter but to a different time. The bill pending relates solely to the claims which have been here, and are familiar to the old members, for the last fifteen or twenty years. The one referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] applies to none except those in which cause of action has accrued within six years. In such cases I have no objection to authorizing the court, where the facts are all in possession of living witnesses, to hear, adjudicate, and determine, and enter judgment as his bill provides. It is a good bill, and I hope it will pass the House. But it will not affect a single bill on the Calendar of the House of which I have any knowledge. On the contrary, the pending bill relates to those claims which have been pressed upon the attention of Congress during the last century.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And these the gentleman proposes to put upon the retired-list.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want now to show what it is this pending bill provides. It provides simply in these cases, instead of conferring on the Court of Claims jurisdiction to enter judgment, that the Court of Claims shall investigate and make a finding of fact in any claims, other than war claims, against the United States, and report all the facts, stating in such report what amount, if anything, is due the claimant or claimants; whether the claim or demand is founded upon any act of Congress, or upon any contract, express or implied; the laches or diligence of the claimant or claimants in presenting the claim or demand against the United States, and such other findings of fact and conclusions of law as the court shall deem material to enable Congress to pass upon such claim or demand; that until such claim or demand is finally investigated and reported upon to Congress by the Court as herein provided, neither House of Congress shall consider the same, by bill or otherwise, in reference to allowing any such claim or demand.

Mark! What for? "To enable Congress to pass upon such demand or claim."

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; in one moment. These cases now upon the Calendars of the two Houses, and especially in the House itself, are getting to be an intolerable burden upon members. They are introduced here at every session of Congress. The honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has shown by his report that in the past twenty-five years we have paid more than half a million of dollars to print private bills, many of which are still pending in Congress, very few of them having been disposed of.

The Committee on Claims therefore has tried to devise some means of sweeping this immense Calendar from Congress, sending the cases to the Court of Claims to have the facts ascertained and a report from that judicial body as to what if anything is due the claimants. It does not confer all the jurisdiction provided for in the bill of the gentleman from Virginia. These two bills, in connection with one to which I will refer in a moment, will in my judgment complete the necessary legislation on this subject.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. He says this will sweep away all these old claims, that Congress shall take no jurisdiction of them hereafter. Now, how does he get around the constitutional right of petition?

Mr. SPRINGER. Petitions may be received for the purpose of reference to the Court of Claims to ascertain the facts. The right of petition is preserved. The claimant comes before Congress and presents his case and the claim is referred to the Court of Claims, as I have already stated, in order that the claimant may be permitted to judicially establish the facts upon which his claim rests.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What are we going to do with them when they come back?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the claimant has a just claim the report of the Court of Claims will be considered by Congress and allowed in the usual manner.

Mr. REED, of Maine. How are you going to consider them?

Mr. SPRINGER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The Congresses that come after us will take care of that. It will certainly be easier to consider the cases after the facts have been judicially found than it is under the present system.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And when a thing is so plain it is going to result in absolutely nothing, is the House to refer an illusive thing like this to men who are making good claims before Congress?

Mr. SPRINGER. The pending bill is not illusive.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is absolutely illusive.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Maine mistakes entirely the object of the proposed legislation.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not mistake the object of it or the result of it. The object is good, but the result will be nothing.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I want the gentleman from Maine to remember this fact, that while we are now oppressed with the investigation of facts in all of these cases, and the very elements of justice in each case are required to be investigated upon ex parte testimony, we desire that such investigation shall be referred to a court of claims for adjudication, so that this court, with reference to this part of the investigation, may aid us in determining the law and the facts upon which the case is founded. After this is done and the case is reported back to Congress, then Congress will do the best it can to afford relief.

Mr. HAMMOND. I wish to state to the gentleman from Illinois that his explanation on the point suggested by my question is very unsatisfactory. I think the bill is unconstitutional in that particular.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to be compelled to differ with such a distinguished lawyer as the gentleman from Georgia; but I do not understand that the right of petition to this Congress or to any subsequent Congress, after this measure shall have become a law, will be denied in any manner or is interfered with to any extent. I do not understand that the right of petition requires Congress to grant the claim whether right or wrong.

Mr. HAMMOND. But it does require you to consider it, which this bill does not.

Mr. SPRINGER. We refer petitions now through the petition-box to committees without reading them or without announcing the fact in the House. We have just as much right to refer these petitions to the Court of Claims as we have to fifteen members of this body; and it is no deprivation of the right of petition to say that we shall make such reference in order that the facts upon which it is based may be properly brought out and established.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And the bill itself provides that when the facts are ascertained they shall be reported back to Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question in reference to this particular clause of the bill:

That until such claim or demand is finally investigated and reported upon to Congress by the court as herein provided, neither House of Congress shall consider the same by bill or otherwise, &c.

Suppose, now, they do not report back at all; will the gentleman tell us how we are going to act upon it under this provision of his bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not indulging any such a supposition as that the Court of Claims will not do its duty. I have no doubt that it will and that these reports will be made, and promptly, too. It is a legal presumption always recognized that all public officials will do their duty. That court is a creature of Congress, as much so as is the Joint Committee on Printing or on the Library, and we have as much right to refer bills to it as we have to refer them to any joint or standing committee of the House; and we can always presume upon prompt compliance with the orders of the House in one case as well as in the other. There is nothing irregular or unusual in this proposed legislation. It will greatly aid Congress in disposing of the public business, relieve Congress of an intolerable burden, and afford honest claimants a means of establishing their claims in a judicial manner.

Now as to the amendment to strike out "war claims," it is sufficient to say that the committee had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter embraced under that term.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois pardon me for a moment? I wish to ask him what is intended by the term "war claims." Does he refer simply to those arising from the military or naval operations of the Government in time of war?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer that question after I have answered the other point as to the intention of the committee in drawing the line between these two classes of claims. It was our purpose in making that distinction to draw the line exactly where the House draws it in its reference of bills to the two committees of Claims and War Claims, and to leave the question just where the rules of the House leave it in that respect.

Mr. DINGLEY. The rule of the House to which the gentleman refers is just as indefinite as the terms of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. That provides for all claims growing out of any war in which the United States shall be engaged.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. McMILLIN. So that it will embrace every war that the Government has been engaged in, and all of the claims growing out of it. But this bill, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, stops at the threshold, for more than half of the bills introduced here are war claims or claims of some kind growing out of some war in which the Government has been engaged; and there is no reason, as Congress retains jurisdiction and control of these matters, that it may not submit all, and in my opinion we should submit them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee has referred to the fact. I have consulted with the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, and he has assured me that his committee will mature a bill covering war claims as a separate measure. I want to remind the House that the term "war claims" covers a vastly different field from these civil claims, and we must define in that bill the extent to which we will go in allowing damages arising from the operations of the war; we must determine questions of loyalty and the operation and effect of the President's proclamation of amnesty. All of these questions must be considered and settled, and such a bill should come in and have a separate standing for itself and by itself. For that reason the Committee on Claims left out this class of claims, and also because of the fact, as I have already stated, that we had no jurisdiction of the subject. I hope when the Committee on War Claims brings in this bill that it will be passed, and that this will be passed; and also that the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the gentleman from Virginia refers, will be passed, with some amendments which need not now be stated. If this House shall secure such legislation during this session, we can return to our constituents with the assurance that this Congress has accomplished more for the best interests of the people of this country than has been accomplished by any of its predecessors for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the language of the fourth section of this bill, which seems to be tantamount to allowing every member of Congress to refer bills to the Court of Claims. This section provides that those bills which have not been referred prior to the adjournment of Congress shall be sent by the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate to the Court of Claims. Under that on the last Monday of the session numbers of bills may be introduced by members which can not be acted upon by the committee, and that of course is tantamount to permitting every member of Congress to refer these bills himself, practically the same as permitting every claimant to go to the Court of Claims himself.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is exactly what we believe to be proper and right in the matter.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That, then, is the object of the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. The object of the committee is to allow every citizen of the United States to have a test of the question as to the validity of his claim against the Government in a legal way. Let him have access to the court, take his claim there, let the court pass upon it, and refer it here if it is a proper claim.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But your bill shuts out two-thirds of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. We will not cover that subject, but when the gentleman from Ohio has brought in his bill on that subject I will aid in passing it. I desire to have this bill passed to-day, and for that purpose I move the previous question.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman before the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. There was a distinct understanding that my amendment would be considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated distinctly that I could not admit the gentleman's amendment except for discussion.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Then let us vote down the demand for the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 52.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. As a vote by tellers will carry us over the hour, the bill must go into the order of unfinished business. I therefore withdraw the demand for the previous question, and I ask unanimous consent that when this bill is again taken up for consideration the bill from the Judiciary Committee and any other bill on the subject may then be considered. I want to meet all these questions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when this bill is next reached as unfinished business the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on the same subject and any other bill, as the Chair understands, reported on the same subject, may be considered with it. The Chair would suggest that there may be some difficulty about providing for the consideration of several bills together.

Mr. SPRINGER. My desire is that a bill which may be reported from the Committee on War Claims may be considered with the others.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Is this the proposition, that any other bill that may be considered may be passed as a substitute for the bill of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois did not so state. He desired unanimous consent that when this bill comes up again as unfinished business other bills on the same subject may be considered with it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I object to that, unless it is the understanding that any other bill may be adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly that would be the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that under such an order it would be in order to move other bills as substitutes for this one.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Would such an order prevent the consideration of the other bills in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks they would not lose any privilege they now have. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is the demand for the previous question still pending?

The SPEAKER. It has been withdrawn. If there be no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to submit some tables as to the expense of publishing bills, &c., which I did not have time to submit during the hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to have the same privilege for myself and any other gentleman who may desire it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the same privilege will be extended to other gentlemen who have addressed the House on this bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

At the Union agency, at $1,800.

Mr. RYAN. I move to strike out the last word.

This agency is one established by the Government for the five civilized tribes. My own judgment is that there is but very little public necessity for this agency. The important uses for which it was established have partially ceased to exist, and those which still remain do not seem to have been performed by that agency; the principal one of which still remaining is to exclude from the Indian Territory all persons not duly authorized to be there.

In this connection I again call attention to the position taken by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] in regard to the lawful authority of the Executive to exclude unauthorized persons from the Indian Territory. It will be borne in mind that in the general discussion he took the broad position that those persons who by the consent of the Cherokee Nation now occupy that portion of their territory west of the ninety-sixth meridian could not be removed by the Executive because there was no law authorizing the President of the United States to interpose the power of the Government for that purpose. I am of opinion he was gravely in error, as I stated in the course of the remarks I had occasion to make yesterday. He is in conflict with all the legal judgment of all administrations and all judicial tribunals that ever passed upon the subject. And I stated then what I undertake now to repeat, that he is also in conflict with clear and express provisions of law about which there can be no ambiguity and no room for misconstruction.

In the treaty of 1866, the one to which the gentleman called the attention of the House, there is a clause excluding all persons from the Cherokee country, or rather making it unlawful for any persons to enter the territory of the Cherokee Nation except such as are specifically authorized by that treaty to enter such territory. Those authorized to enter are mentioned specifically and are of several classes: sutlers, persons duly authorized by the Government to trade with the Indians; persons perhaps who have permits to pass into or through the same; persons who may be engaged in the construction of the railway which this treaty authorizes to be constructed through it, &c. But all others, says the treaty, are unauthorized and shall be excluded by the Government of the United States. The following is its language.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. The language of the treaty is this:

And all persons not in the military service of the United States, not citizens of the Cherokee Nation, are to be prohibited from coming into the Cherokee Nation, or remaining in the same except as herein otherwise provided; and it is the duty of the United States Indian agent for the Cherokees to have such persons, not lawfully residing or sojourning therein, removed from the nation, as they now are or hereafter may be required by the Indian intercourse laws of the United States.

Here it is expressly provided that the Indian agents shall remove from the Cherokee Nation all persons not specifically authorized by that treaty to enter or remain therein. The treaty expressly provides who may so enter, how, and for what purpose. All others, says this treaty, are "prohibited." And the agent shall remove them. How remove them? Why, in the manner provided in the intercourse laws. How is that? Why, by the Indian agent, subagent, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. And the President is authorized to use the Army for that purpose. This prohibition applies to all persons not specifically excepted in the treaty itself, and nobody will pretend that the lessees now occupying that country are among the excepted classes.

Let me call attention now to those Indian intercourse laws. Section 2147 Revised Statutes provides:

The Superintendent of Indian Affairs and the Indian agents and subagents shall have authority to remove from the Indian country all persons found therein contrary to law. And the President is authorized to direct the military force to be employed in such removal.

Section 2149 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized and required, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to remove from any tribal reservation any person being therein without authority of law, or whose presence within the limits of the reservation may, in the judgment of the Commissioner, be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians; and may employ for the purpose such force as may be necessary to enable the agent to effect the removal of such person.

Then section 2150 provides that—

The military forces of the United States may be employed in such manner and under such regulations as the President may direct, first in the apprehension of every person who may be in the Indian country in violation of law, and in conveying him immediately from the Indian country by the nearest convenient and safe route to the civil authority of the Territory or judicial district in which such person shall be found, to be proceeded against in due course of law.

Here, Mr. Chairman, are direct, affirmative, positive provisions of law imposing a duty upon the Executive to remove from the Cherokee lands and the Cherokee Nation all persons not authorized to go there under the treaty of 1866. That duty has been neglected as well by the past administration as by the present. My object in calling attention to it is to refute the position taken by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], that there is no duty imposed by law upon the Executive to remove from the Cherokee Nation those persons who are now occupying it under void leases—determined to be void by all the judicial and other authorities that are authorized to pass upon the subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, far be it from my purpose to make any reflection upon gentlemen prosecuting that honorable and useful industry that is being carried on in that Territory under leases with the Indians. They are entitled to the favorable and just consideration of all men. It is a most valuable industry.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS was recognized, and yielded to Mr. RYAN.

Mr. RYAN. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the industry in question is a valuable and useful one to mankind, and one which never ought to be dealt with unjustly or harshly under any circumstances; and in any event the law should be so executed as to do those engaged in it no injustice. But, sir, there is only one safe rule for all executive officers to pursue in a Government like ours; that is, to faithfully and fearlessly execute the law and perform all the duties and all the functions that the law affirmatively and positively imposes upon them. No other course is safe. No other course can be approved by the people of this country, and unless, with regard to this particular Territory, the executive shall faithfully execute the law, there will be little opportunity for this Congress to inaugurate a change of policy for the benefit alike of the American people and of the Indians themselves.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, supposing the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RYAN] is made in good faith——

Mr. RYAN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, it was only to that proposition that I desired to speak.

The Clerk read as follows:

107. At the Mackinac agency, at $1,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 107. In making this motion I desire the attention of the committee for a few minutes.

On yesterday I listened attentively to the criticisms of my colleague from Texas the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs on the views presented by myself and others touching the Indian policy of the Government. While I heard a good deal of gushing sentiment, very prettily uttered, I heard no solid, substantial reason given for the extravagance and folly of our Indian management.

The speech reminded me of an anecdote I might repeat, if not too broad for this presence, but the application is that the speech was a little thin but quite copious.

The gentleman has said that the Indian has suffered from the rapacity of the white man. That may be so, but not from the action of the Government. The Government has always acted justly to the Indian, and every word and action of mine has been in favor of the most liberal treatment of the Indian question. The five civilized nations, after wars and troubles, were bought out and given as fair a portion of this continent as the sun shines upon, and as an evidence of good treatment are the richest people to-day within my knowledge.

In place of the industrial schools, I propose to encourage Christian denominations to erect churches and schools among them; and for this purpose the Government should give a fair portion of what it now gives to industrial schools, believing the money would be better applied and do more good than is now secured by its lavish expenditure for cooks and laundresses, tailors, seamstresses, butchers, and herders.

In reply to my suggestion that officers on the active and retired list of the Army be detailed as Indian agents, he quoted a saying of General Houston in regard to Army officers and their unfitness for duties pertaining to civil life. In answer to that I have to say that I apprehend General Houston's remark was made upon some other subject, and not in connection with the one under consideration. I have further to say in reply that a Democratic House of Representatives some years ago passed a bill through this body placing the entire management of Indian affairs under the control of the War Department. I apprehend that judgment, if not so brilliant, was equal in solidity to the judgment of my colleague.

The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has said that with my usual proneness to error I had made mistakes in respect to Indian schools.

Mr. WELLBORN. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; I never made any remark about my colleague's "usual proneness to error." I would not think for a moment of making any such general charge.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am glad to hear my colleague's explanation.

However that may be, I have to say if it is a mistake on my part to point out and oppose the policy of appropriating nearly $400,000 for the transportation of twenty-two hundred or twenty-three hundred Indian youths to distant parts of the country for education, of appropriating $700,000 for repair and construction of school-houses and for the purchase of provisions to support such as attend the industrial schools—to point out the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the support, civilization, instruction, education, and comfort of the Indians in such manner that you can not distinguish how much is for support, how much for civilization, or how much for instruction and education; if it is a mistake to allude to the millions that are due our own people, whose homes have been desolated and property taken and who are entitled to pay under treaties, and who are left to wait while millions are appropriated for their despoilers; if the suggestion that a different policy be pursued is an error on my part, then I am quite content to leave it to the country, to the tax-payers, and the people who have suffered to determine wherein the proneness to error lies—whether with me or with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. In relation to the amendment I have offered, it will be remembered that in the remarks I submitted some days ago in respect to the management of Indian affairs I suggested the abolishing of some of the agencies and the consolidation of others. I believe the amendment offered a moment since by the gentleman from Kansas should have been adopted, and I believe that this Mackinac agency should be abolished.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the amendment, but I wish to call the attention of my friend from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] to the fact that the views expressed by his colleague [Mr. THROCKMORTON] touching many of these agencies are undoubtedly well founded. The Blackfoot agency and the Fort Peck, Fort Belknap, and Fort Berthold agencies ought clearly to be consolidated. I think a very cursory examination of the subject will convince any gentleman that those agencies, instead of being distinct, should be one agency, under the control of one agent.

As to the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the Mackinaw agency, the gentleman will remember that the remarks of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] were received with great favor the other day when he proposed that the Indians be made self-supporting—independent citizens. Now, this Mackinac agency has reference to men who are citizens and voters of the State of Michigan. It does not apply to wild tribes of Indians, but to citizens and voters, living on their separate possessions. I think that the policy of maintaining that agency is entirely indefensible. You might just as well apply the principle of Government protection to any other body of citizens. It is certainly entirely anomalous to appoint an agent on the part of the Federal Government to look after the affairs of men who are citizens of a State of the Union. Such a proceeding, it seems to me, detracts from the manhood of the people. If you can apply this principle of Government protection to citizens of the State of Michigan who happen to be of Indian descent, why should not the Federal Government extend similar care, protection, and control over citizens elsewhere? When these people have become, as I think these particular Indians have, self-supporting and independent, when they have ceased to belong to tribes and have become a portion of the citizens of a State, this assumed care by the Government ought to cease.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. A motion was made to strike out the Mackinac agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that a motion was made.

Mr. THOCKMORTON. I intended to test the sense of the Committee of the Whole on that proposition.

Mr. SKINNER. If the motion is not withdrawn, I wish to say that wherever there is an agency there must be necessity for an agent; and no one will say that the compensation at the point now under consideration is too large.

Mr. PEEL. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I agree fully with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and my friend from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] that there are a great many of these small agencies which should be consolidated, the Indians under the care of the agency being considerably advanced in civilization; but in my judgment it will not do to dispense with an agency at any place where there is money of the Government to be disbursed or any public business to be transacted, unless we provide some substitute for the agency. It will not do to merely strike out the appropriation and discontinue the agency when there is no act of Congress authorizing a consolidation and no authority for any provision to take the place of the agency. It seems to me it would be very impolitic to abolish any one of these agencies until measures are taken for consolidation and for controlling the business of the Government at the particular point.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will allow me to say that if there are any installments or annuities due to the Indians within the limits of what is known as the Mackinac agency the amounts are exceedingly small, and can be paid by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs without the least embarrassment through his special agents or through his inspectors, of whom there are ten. There is no trouble whatever about that. These Indians are not congregated upon the little island of Mackinac at the head of Lake Superior; they are scattered over the country in both peninsulas of Michigan, on their farms, engaged in the ordinary pursuits of white men. If they still continue to receive small annuities, those, as I have said, may be paid without the least embarrassment through the numerous officers at the command of the Indian Bureau; no trouble whatever about it. All Indians of this class, where the Indians are citizens, not gathered together as a body of Indians to be looked after, but scattered over the country and engaged in the ordinary avocations of life—there is no necessity for retaining Indian agents to pay annuities, as sometimes the annuities are a mere bagatelle, which can be paid once a year instead of employing an agent for that purpose all the year round.

Mr. SKINNER. The gentleman is mistaken in reference to what I said. As I understand it this bill does not provide the agency simply to pay for the agent at the agency. As I understand the rules of the House we are not permitted to bring in any new legislation in an appropriation bill. To do away with this agency would, in my opinion, be new legislation. Then so long as the agency is there it is our duty to provide for the pay of the agent at that agency. We propose at some future time to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill consolidating a great many of these Indian agencies. When that is done, then an appropriation to pay an agent at an agency which has been done away with will be a dead-letter and we will lose nothing by passing this bill as it is.

Mr. NELSON. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana it is to strike out Mackinac agency. Now, if that gentleman will examine the report of the Indian Commissioner for 1884, which is the last full report that has been published, he will find that there are over nine thousand Indians at this agency, divided into four different bands, as follows:

Bands.	Number.	Total.
Pottawatomie, of Huron	77	77
Chippewa, of Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River	2,500	9,500
Chippewa, of Lake Superior	1,000
Ottawa and Chippewa	6,000

A large number of these Indians are still uncivilized. I will quote the letter of the agent, to be found on page 147:

MACKINAC AGENCY, MICHIGAN, Ypsilanti, September 9, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to submit my annual report.

During the year I have repaired seven school-houses and established three new schools, namely, at Munising and Iroquois Point, on Lake Superior, and at Hannahville, in Menominee County. There should be two or three others but for want of Government buildings, and I have not deemed it best to ask for them. There are now eleven schools in the agency, and the percentage of attendance shows a good increase upon that of 1883.

The Indians are engaged in farming, fishing, lumbering, and miscellaneous work. The severe weather of the early spring cut off some crops, so that while more acres have been cultivated, yet the net results in crops are not so large as in the preceding year.

I have by every means induced the Indians to go upon lands, and many have done so, but more should. The Indian is a good farmer in a small way only, but the settlement of white farmers around him has been a help by way of example. Fishing has been very poor, and those who have followed that work have obtained a precarious support. Such I have strongly urged to go upon land, but their love of water is such that they will not give up their fishing.

In all the schools I have religious teachers, who make the moral advancement of the children a special work by my directions. This instruction is general and not sectarian, and in most of the settlements the work of the teachers constitutes all the religious care these people have. They are isolated and too poor to pay anything either for schools or preaching.

No epidemic has been among them, and the bane of the Indians, drunkenness, has largely decreased, especially among the Lake Superior Indians.

I have during the year steadily impressed upon the minds of the Indians the fact that the land, money, tools, &c., supplied them by the Government are not gratuities, but given in accordance with treaties, which will soon be fulfilled, when they must depend upon themselves. Its effect has been to stimulate many, especially the young, to get land and prevent those owning land from parting with it for a trifle, as has been the case in former years. I counted it very important that they should well understand this and shall continue to urge it.

I have allotted several thousand acres of land during the year, and there are thousands of acres yet to be given when parties shall have arrived at the proper age.

The objects kept in view this year were to encourage individual industry, especially by taking land, make the schools more efficient, the attendance larger, and generally to teach these Indians to care for themselves and get houses and homes for their children. I have succeeded partially, and hope for better results in the same direction.

Very respectfully,

EDWARD P. ALLEN, Indian Agent.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Now, the point I desire to make, Mr. Chairman, is this: Here are a large number of Indians, nearly ten thousand of them, who are still a great way from being civilized. They are still not able to take care of themselves, and there is as much occasion to retain an agent there to take care and manage these Indians and look after their welfare as at other points at which agents are now employed.

Mr. WELLBORN. While I am scarcely able to talk, because of the condition of my voice, still I feel it necessary to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WELLBORN. I will move then to strike out the last word.

Mr. PEEL. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WELLBORN. I will renew it for the purpose of making a remark or two. I wish to read, in addition to what has been already read by the gentleman from Minnesota, these words from what the agent says:

I have allotted several thousand acres of land during the year, and there are thousands of acres yet to be given when parties shall have arrived at the proper age.

He then goes on to give the various other duties at that agency.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] there are ninety-five hundred Indians tributary to this agency, and that it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the Indians, the execution of the allotment law is absolutely necessary to have the agency at Mackinac.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is aware these Indians are citizens and voters in that State.

Mr. WELLBORN. Many of them are and many of them are not. I wish to make a general remark, and then I will not undertake to tax my voice further on this particular bill. Wherever there is a reservation with any considerable number of Indians it is an absolute necessity to have an agent on that reservation. We all know from experience that the whites are pressing upon all these reservations, and unless you have an agent there to protect the Indians you can not keep out intruders. The committee sent it to the Indian Office for investigation, and we were informed to abolish this Indian agency would require special examiners to be sent out, costing ten times the pay of these Indian agents.

The gentleman, while I give him credit for his efforts to economize expenditures, in this particular instance would but swell the expenses of this Department and not reduce them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Texas to what employment are the five Indian inspectors and five special agents put if it is not for the performance of just such duties as looking after the subjects for which the agents are paid?

Mr. WELLBORN. They are subject to the control of the Secretary of the Interior, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana; they are the agencies and instrumentalities, the responsible instrumentalities, by which the Secretary of the Interior gains knowledge in reference to the various Indian tribes scattered throughout the country. Or, in other words, to use the expression of the Secretary, they are the "eyes and the ears" of the Interior Department, and are designed to do just such duties as the gentleman has suggested, and which have been found absolutely essential for the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, in reference——

Mr. WELLBORN. Just let me get through with one question at a time. The duty of the Indian inspector is not to act as an Indian agent, but to find out what the agents do, and if they violate the law to report it to the Interior Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all very well——

Mr. WELLBORN. It is all very true.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is well enough to make expenditures for this purpose where the agency extends over a large area of country, or where it expends a large amount of money for the distribution of annuity goods, Indian supplies, &c. But any gentleman who will pass through the various Indian agencies can not fail to perceive that ten agents authorized to be employed in this case—that is to say, five Indian inspectors and five special agents to look after the Indian affairs—can not have any very material duties to perform, unless it be such duties as are supposed to be performed by the local agents, to look after the interests of the Indian, his rights as well as those of the white man, and generally such other duties as the agent performs. But here is a case to which I have already called attention, where these Indians have their homes right in the midst of the white men, surrounded by white people, and have been surrounded for an entire generation at least. They are Indians whom we have treated as citizens of this country. They are voters of the State of Michigan, as I understand, and yet it is proposed to keep up the guardianship of the Federal Government over them. I do not want to see the Government exercising a guardianship over any portion of the people that is not necessary. It is a very objectionable feature to me.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these are citizens and voters of the State of Michigan?

Mr. HOLMAN. I was so informed.

Mr. WELLBORN. Some of them are.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Necessary traveling expenses of one Indian school superintendent, including incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, $1,000: Provided, That he shall be allowed $4 per day for traveling expenses when actually on duty in the field, exclusive of cost of transportation and sleeping-car fare.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask my friend from Texas in charge of this bill if this is not an unusual discrimination? I refer to the proviso appended to this paragraph:

That he shall be allowed $4 per day for traveling expenses when actually on duty in the field, exclusive of cost of transportation and sleeping-car fare.

The next clause but one of this bill provides for the incidental expenses of the Indian agents, and allows $3 per day when actually employed, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare. There seems to be no reason for a distinction between the amount allowed to the interpreters and the special agents as to the cost of living, independently of the cost of transportation.

By the general law all of the agents of the Government are paid the same sum now, at $3 per day for expenses and transportation. That is the rule in regard to the special agents of the Internal Revenue Bureau and the great body of the agents that we employ. It has gradually worked itself into that form; and, therefore, I would like to ask my friend why it is that the Indian inspectors are placed upon a different footing.

Mr. WELLBORN. The provision to which the gentleman refers relates now to the superintendent.

Mr. HOLLMAN. Yes; the gentleman is correct. But why is the superintendent of Indian schools placed upon a different footing from others engaged in a like duty as far as necessary and incidental expenses are concerned?

Mr. WELLBORN. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana I will say that when the estimates came in that discrepancy and difference between the allowance for the Indian school superintendent and the Indian agents arrested my attention, and I inquired of the Indian Office why it should exist. I was informed by the financial clerk that it was at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior, and the reason given was that the superintendent was called to New York more frequently than elsewhere for the purpose of looking after supplies for the Indian schools, and that his expenses while there when he goes on with the Indian Commissioner were necessarily higher than the expenses of the agents, who travel over the Western country mostly. That is the reason.

Mr. HOLMAN. How is it possible that the superintendent of the Indian schools can be put to any considerable expense for traveling expenses beyond the expense incurred by the agents?

Mr. WELLBORN. His duties call him frequently to New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. But are not his duties right out among the Indians themselves? Is not that the main field of his operations?

Mr. WELLBORN. His duties are more frequently in Washington perhaps.

Mr. HOLMAN. What was the appropriation last year?

Mr. WELLBORN. The same.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me for a moment? Up to this time the debate on this paragraph has been proceeding by unanimous consent; no amendment has been offered, and no point of order is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a pro forma amendment pending.

Mr. CANNON. I did not even understand that to be the fact. I was listening pretty carefully, because I wanted to see whether my friend from Indiana was to let lines 133, 134, and 135 pass without making the point of order. That clause changes existing law; it gives $4 a day for traveling expenses to this Indian school superintendent—a most unexampled increase. I want to call the attention of my friend from Indiana, who is familiar with this matter, to the question whether or not a point of order should not be made on that clause.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am pleased to answer the gentleman that I understood the appropriation was made last year.

Mr. WELLBORN. It has been raised a dollar a day.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was no intimation that there was any legislation upon this bill, and for that reason there has been no point of order raised. How is it that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] did not happen to make the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I supposed my friend from Indiana would do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. Suppose your friend from Indiana was not aware of the fact that the clause was liable to the point of order?

Mr. WELLBORN. I am not going to adhere to any strict technicalities. If there is anything in this bill which should go out on a point of order, let it go.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order this is new legislation, inasmuch as it increases a salary upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. WELLBORN. What salary?

Mr. HOLMAN. The per diem allowance.

Mr. WELLBORN. Do you find that in the bill of last year?

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume it was $3 a day. I am looking to see.

Mr. SKINNER. The appropriation for this purpose in the bill of last year was $1,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is new legislation in this, that the mode of compensation under the existing law is so much per year. Now it is changed to $4 a day. Let it be $3, as in a subsequent paragraph.

Mr. WELLBORN. I want to give the gentleman some information about that, if he will allow me. The compensation heretofore has not been made at the rate of $3 per day, but it has been paid under regulations of the Interior Department, which required the school superintendent to itemize every item of cost. But to settle this question let the gentleman put it at $3.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will do. I move to strike out "$4" and insert "$3" in line 133.

Mr. SKINNER. I move to strike out the last word.

If there is to be any new legislation at all I say that the compensation ought to be $4 a day. The Indian Office showed to the satisfaction of the Committee on Indian Affairs that this had cost during last year more than $4 a day. In the last appropriation bill there was no provision limiting the allowance at all, and the superintendent of Indian schools was required to make out a bill of expenses, and when that bill of expenses came in, if approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it was paid. Last year it amounted to fully $4, and in many instances more than $4 per diem.

If this is to be changed at all, if the bill which has been reported from the committee is changed, let it go back exactly as it was last year, and let so much money be appropriated for these traveling expenses without any provision of this kind at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of my friend from North Carolina to the fact that this is a very ample salary to begin with.

Mr. SKINNER. I make the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana that it is new legislation. The original provision has been stricken out on the ground of its being new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina go to the entire item or to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SKINNER. To the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I apprehend there will be no trouble about this. I wish to call the attention of my friend from North Carolina to the fact that this salary is a very ample one, and that our whole legislation on the face of this bill as to all the other persons who are required to travel is to pay $3 a day and cost of transportation. Now I see no reason for making a discrimination here. The office is vacant and we can act impersonally with regard to it. I am glad to see the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs acquiesces in the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana point to the law?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina made the point of order on my amendment, which is to strike out $4 and insert $3.

Mr. SKINNER. The gentleman from Indiana made a point of order on the item as reported by the committee, which is this:

Provided, That he shall be allowed $4 per day for traveling expenses.

It was conceded that that was liable to the point of order, and it went out on the point of order. Then the gentleman offers an amendment with the same provision, only making it $3 a day. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this item is a reduction. The amount appropriated last year was $1,500. In this bill it is made $1,000. I make the point of order on the gentleman's amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend from North Carolina misapprehends the state of the case. There is no point of order pending on my part.

Mr. SKINNER. Did not you make the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggested that the point of order might be made.

Mr. SKINNER. But did not you make it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have made no formal point of order, Mr. Chairman; or if I have, I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was about to make a point of order upon the provision in the bill allowing this officer $4 per day, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] said he was willing that the paragraph should be amended so as to make the amount $3 a day; whereupon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withheld his point of order.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made the point of order as against the original proposition. I then stated that while the original point of order was too late, still, if there was anything in this bill that ought not to be in it under the rules of the House, so far as I was personally concerned I wanted it struck out. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] then proposed that the amount allowed should be $3 instead of $4. Personally, I said I had no objection to that; but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] immediately arose and said that he did object, and he then made the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. SKINNER. If no point of order was made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], then of course the original proposition stands; and if he proposes to amend it, we can vote upon that amendment. All I want is to take the sense of this committee upon the question whether the superintendent of Indian schools shall be allowed for traveling expenses $4 a day or $3 a day or whether we shall not set any limit at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] is aware that this is one of the best paid officers in the service, independent of this compensation.

Mr. SKINNER. He deserves to be well paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. The late superintendent was a very valuable public officer, I admit, but the office is vacant, and I am very glad that we can deal with the subject now entirely unembarrassed by personal considerations. All I ask is that this officer shall be placed as to expenses upon the same footing with the others.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SKINNER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made the point of order first.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no point of order pending.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no point of order pending, the Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. SKINNER. All I want is to have a vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that no point of order is raised. The question then recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana reducing the amount from $4 to $3 a day.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents, and of their offices, and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, also traveling and incidental expenses of five special agents, at $3 per day when actually employed, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law; for pay of employés, and for pay of five special agents, at $2,000 per annum each, $40,000.

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend that paragraph by inserting, in line 145, after the word "employés," the words "not otherwise provided for."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I must reserve the point of order upon that amendment until I understand the necessity for it. It seems to me that the language of the bill "for pay of employés" is broad enough.

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, that was inserted by the committee out of abundant caution, but as there are some employés not provided for, we deemed it best to make the amendment as I propose, so as to exclude those who are provided for. Some are provided for and some are not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think I must insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. That it would change existing law.

Mr. SKINNER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of clothing, as per same article, $12,000.

Mr. RYAN. I move to strike out the last word of this paragraph for the purpose of asking my friend who has charge of this bill to explain the proposed increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to reserve the point of order upon this provision.

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, that increase was made entirely on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He said he thought it was necessary, and on his recommendation the committee determined to recommend an increase of $1,000 over the appropriation of last year.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, that is one of those flexible provisions in the treaty which may be complied with by the expenditure of more or less money according as the Department may deem best. The Commissioner can buy expensive articles or he can buy articles that are not expensive, and I doubt the propriety of this increase, but, as a point of order is pending, I shall not discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the criticism of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] I have to say that this is one of the unliquidated items that we find in treaties. It allows the Indians a certain amount of clothing per capita, and this proposed increase is based upon the idea that the clothing to be provided during the next fiscal year will cost more than the clothing provided during the current fiscal year. That is the ground upon which the increase is proposed. In this treaty, as in many others, you will find a provision for a certain amount of clothing without any specification in dollars and cents as to how much it shall cost. It is in the nature of an unliquidated amount.

Mr. RYAN. Certainly. It is in the nature of an unliquidated amount; and if we appropriate $25,000 it simply enables the Department to purchase more costly clothing.

Mr. NELSON. That is not it at all.

Mr. RYAN. There is an appropriation of $12,000 provided for here; and the point I make is that this is one of those flexible provisions of a treaty authorizing certain articles of clothing to be purchased.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; we are aware of that.

Mr. RYAN. Now, the amount to be expended depends altogether upon the quality of that clothing; and if the executive department has more money it will buy a better article of clothing, or rather a finer article, though perhaps not so well adapted to the uses for which it is intended.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman states only a part of the proposition. The amount to be appropriated does not necessarily depend on the price of the clothing in itself, but on the variation of prices in one year as compared with another. It is a fact, which the figures will prove, that the prices of clothing next year are liable to be higher than they have been in the past year. This is what the additional $1,000 is based upon.

Mr. RYAN. I think the quality of clothing which can be bought for $11,000 will answer the purpose of those savages who are wearing blankets.

Mr. SOWDEN. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether the number of Indians to be supplied with clothing has not increased?

Mr. WELLBORN. I desire to state—and it has occurred to me since the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] has been on his feet—that there has been an advance in civilization among these Indians; many of them have thrown off their blankets, and the number wearing the clothing of civilized people is greater now than last year. I now remember that was the reason assigned for this increase.

In connection with this very agency, I wish to state that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs informs me—and I believe he was with the commission that visited the Territory—there has been within the last year the most wonderful progress among these Indians; that they are now breaking up 6,000 acres of land. I believe he told me they have bought many miles of wire fence; and I understand he confidently expects that in the next bill the item for the support of these Indians can be very largely reduced.

Mr. STEELE. Would the gentleman have the Committee of the Whole understand that the advance of these Indians in civilization is due to the visit of gentlemen of this House?

Mr. WELLBORN. I have no doubt that it exerted a civilizing influence over the Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. RYAN. Those Indians have, perhaps, made very rapid progress since we were there. I have no doubt they have leaped into agricultural pursuits with remarkable rapidity since we were there, and have become fitted for wearing excellent clothing of broadcloth, and that it is the duty of the Government to make provision for them accordingly. Still I think the public service will be as well subserved if the quality of the goods should be made more serviceable and not quite so costly. I think an appropriation of $11,000 will suffice for the clothing of these Indians, who were in such a savage condition but a few months ago that nearly the whole Army of the United States had to be employed in keeping them from an outbreak.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman object to the Indians wearing breeches instead of blankets?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] offer an amendment?

Mr. RYAN. A point of order was made by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that any point of order was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. While the gentleman from Kansas was speaking I announced that I reserved a point of order; but, on reflection, I can see how utterly impossible it is to get along with an appropriation bill without legislation. I have always anticipated this trouble. In view of this difficulty I do not press the point of order.

Mr. PEEL. I desire to confirm what has been said in regard to the increase of the Indians entitled to this appropriation for clothing under treaty stipulations. As has already been remarked, many of these treaty provisions are of a flexible nature. If gentlemen will investigate they will find that the articles of clothing to be furnished by the Government to these Indians upon an appropriation of $12,000 must certainly be of a veay cheap grade.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the last appropriation was not made upon the basis of a number of Indians that a subsequent census has shown to be largely in excess of the actual number. Does not the census taken since the last appropriation was made show that there are some 2,800 Indians less than were contemplated when the appropriation for the current year was made?

Mr. PEEL. That may be true in the aggregate——

Mr. RYAN. That being so, how can this increased appropriation be justified?

Mr. PEEL. If any gentleman will make an examination as to the articles specified by the treaties to be furnished to these Indians per capita, and will estimate the value of ordinary goods out of which this clothing must be made, he will find that the aggregate cost would be far in excess of any appropriation we have ever made for this purpose. I am satisfied that in the last five years we have not appropriated anything like what is required under these treaties.

Mr. RYAN. I can not see the propriety of increasing the appropriation where there has been a decrease of over 33⅓ per cent. in the number of Indians appropriated for, and I therefore move to make the amount eleven instead of twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. WELLBORN. I wish to say one word, and then we shall have a vote. The reason for the increase is the one I have stated. The Indian Office tells me the number of Indians now wearing civilized clothing are in excess of those supplied for the present year.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHIPPEWAS, PILLAGERS, AND LAKE WINNEBAGOSHISH BANDS.

For thirty-second of forty installments of annuity, in money, per third article of treaty of February 22, 1855, and third article of treaty of May 7, 1864, $10,666.66.

For thirty-second of forty installments of annuity, in goods, per same articles of same treaties, $8,000.

For thirty-second of forty installments, for purposes of utility, per same articles of same treaties, $4,000; in all, $22,666.66.

Mr. WELLBORN. I will submit an amendment, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and then request the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to explain it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the last word in line 206, the following:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the several tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for such modification of existing treaties with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000, to be immediately available, but any agreement made shall not take effect until ratified by Congress."

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the question of order on that amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered by the unanimous direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is based upon a special message of the President of the United States, submitting a special estimate for this very appropriation. It did not reach the notice of the Committee on Indian Affairs until after they had prepared and reported the pending bill. That special message of the President is dated January 25, 1886. In this message the President recommended, in view of the destitute condition in which several bands of the Chippewas in Minnesota were placed, that a small appropriation of $15,000 should be made for the purpose of negotiating a proper treaty with them. It is stated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—

That the removal and consolidation of the various bands of Chippewas now occupying separate reservations in Minnesota, as well as the scattered bands who reside outside the limits of the reservations to which they respectively belong, has long been felt to be a most desirable object of accomplishment.

The friends of the Indians have persistently urged the movement, and bills have repeatedly been introduced in Congress having that object in view.

The Indians it is proposed to remove to White Earth now occupy reservations in Minnesota as follows: Lake Winnebagoshish (which includes Cass Lake and White Oak Point), Leech Lake, Mille Lac, Fond du Lac, Grand Portage, Bois Forte, Deer Creek, and Vermillion Lake. Besides these there are a large number scattered throughout the State, belonging to one or the other of the several bands occupying these reservations, whom it is equally desirable to place on the White Earth reservation.

Now, these Indians live upon petty reservations in the midst of timber. They have no other lands left to them. Their annuities are about to expire, and they are in a poor and destitute condition. The President of the United States recommends an appropriation be made for the purpose of negotiating treaties with them, to the end that this land which they possess, and which is of no value to them, brings them no income, and is of no use for agricultural purposes, may be sold, and these Indians may then be consolidated on another reservation where they can engage in agriculture.

Mr. LONG. Among white men?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, that they may be located among white men and engage in agriculture upon land which can be cultivated.

The President recommended $15,000 and the committee reduced the appropriation from the estimate to $10,000.

Mr. LONG. It is understood, of course, these Indians are to consent before any agreement shall be considered final?

Mr. NELSON. Of course.

Mr. LONG. Would it not be as well to publish the special message of the President?

Mr. NELSON. I would be very glad to have that done.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman has only referred to it, and as it fully explains not only the necessity for this appropriation, but also that it is asked for by Bishop Whipple and others interested in the welfare of these Indians, perhaps it would be better it should go upon the record.

Mr. NELSON. Very well. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of proposed legislation, providing for negotiations with the various tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, with a view to the improvement of their present condition.

It is requested that the matter may have early attention, consideration, and action by Congress,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 25, 1886.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, January 16, 1886.

To the PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit herewith a report of 14th instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, presenting, with recommendation, an item which he suggests be inserted in the Indian appropriation bill, providing for negotiations with the several tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for modification of existing treaties, &c.

A copy of a letter from Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, on the condition of these Indians, accompanies the report of the Commissioner.

The object sought to be obtained by the proposed legislation, which has my concurrence, is the gathering together and placing upon the White Earth reservation, in said State, of the various tribes and bands of said Indians who are now either located upon minor reservations or wandering at large through the State. The Commissioner informs this Department that the Indians upon the White Earth reservation are desirous of making arrangements for the proposed consolidation, and states that the measure proposed has long been a most desirable object of accomplishment for the improvement of the condition of the Indians referred to.

I therefore respectfully request that the subject may be presented to Congress for the early attention and action of that body.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, Washington, January 14, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference the 16th ultimo, for my "careful consideration," of a communication from Right Rev. Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, dated October 14, 1885, suggesting the advisability of calling the chiefs of the several bands of Chippewa Indians in said State to this city, with a view to negotiating an agreement through them for the removal and consolidation of the several tribes and bands of said Indians on the White Earth reservation, said State.

Since the receipt of said communication, a paper in the form of a petition has been received from the chiefs and headmen of the White Earth reservation, asking that a delegation from said reservation be permitted to visit Washington to urge the proposed consideration and consult upon other matters.

Upon this subject I have to state that the removal and consolidation of the various bands of Chippewas now occupying separate reservations in Minnesota, as well as the scattered bands who reside outside the limits of the reservations to which they respectively belong, has long been felt to be a most desirable object of accomplishment.

The friends of the Indians have persistently urged the movement, and bills have repeatedly been introduced in Congress, having that object in view.

The Indians it is proposed to remove to White Earth now occupy reservations in Minnesota as follows: Lake Winnebagoshish (which includes Cass Lake and White Oak Point), Leech Lake, Mille Lac, Fond du Lac, Grand Portage, Bois Forte, Deer Creek, and Vermillion Lake. Besides these there are a large number scattered throughout the State, belonging to one or the other of the several bands occupying these reservations, whom it is equally desirable to place on the White Earth reservation.

I do not deem it essential that the particulars in each case should be stated, or that the conditions and wants of the several tribes or bands should be discussed separately in detail. Their condition is very much the same. If not in all respects equally deplorable, it is safe to say that they are all rapidly retrograding, and, if left as they are, it will not be long before they are reduced to a condition of utter hopelessness.

The consolidation of the Chippewas on the White Earth reservation appears to have been a popular theme in the reports and correspondence of this office for years. The annual reports and other records abound in suggestions and recommendations having that object in view, and yet nothing satisfactory has been accomplished.

Every one who has visited the Indians in an official capacity and looked into their condition, whether inspector, special agent, or agent in charge, has had the same story to tell of idleness, poverty, and steadily-increasing degradation. So of the missionaries and other friends who have had occasion to go among them. All have borne testimony to the wretchedness of their condition, at least as regards the larger portion of them, and there seems to have been but one opinion as to the proper remedy to be applied—removal to the White Earth reservation.

Take the case of the Mille Lac band, by way of illustration. They occupy a reservation east of the Mississippi River, near the center of the State, which they ceded to the United States in 1863, reserving the right to remain there during good behavior. The stipulation in regard to continued occupancy was—

"That owing to the heretofore good conduct of the Mille Lac Indians they shall not be compelled to remove so long as they do not in any way interfere with or in any manner molest the persons or property of the whites."

Although they have thus far managed to avoid a forfeiture of their right to remain on the ceded lands, the feeble tenure by which they have held them has been a great obstacle to their advancement, and has prevented anything being done for their improvement and advancement toward civilization.

The Indians have never been willing to remove, and their right of occupancy has thus far been respected by the Government, to the exclusion of white settlers who have long been clamoring for possession.

There has been a strong pressure from the outside for their removal, owing to the fact that the reservation is rich in pine timber. This, being known to the Indians, has had a tendency to increase their opposition to removal, and it would seem that their chief aim and ambition has been simply to avoid a forfeiture of their rights on the reservation.

Their present condition is most pitiable. Their reservation is almost worthless for agricultural purposes, their scanty food supply being obtained from the natural products of the soil—roots and berries—or by hunting and fishing.

What little money they obtain is mostly spent for whisky, and although effort has been made to break up the traffic with them, drunkenness and vagabondism has been on the steady increase.

Inspector Armstrong, who visited them in October last, speaks as follows:

"The Mille Lac Indians number about nine hundred and fifty. They are now drifting along the settlements and railroad towns, bartering berries and prostituting their women for whisky. They are a drunken, idle, and worthless lot of Indians. They can be seen at the stations, and many travelers form their ideas of Indians from seeing these miserable specimens. They should be gathered together and forced to go upon the White Earth reservation, where they properly belong."

Rev. T. A. Gilfillan, a well-known and highly respected missionary among the Chippewas for over thirteen years, says:

"The condition of the Mille Lac band scattered from within 40 miles of Minneapolis, along by Mille Lacs to Brainerd, and of the White Oak Point band scattered from the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad to Lake Winnebagoshish, over a vast country, is most dreadful.

"It is the open, festering sore of the State of Minnesota, and one that calls for instant attention from all who have any feelings of humanity. The white people about Mille Lac have very properly petitioned for the removal of these Indians to the White Earth reservation, where they own jointly with those now there, but if the door be closed against them where are they to go? * * *

"As I have visited every two months or oftener the Indians on the Red Lake, Cass Lake, Lake Winnebagoshish, and Leech Lake reservations, and have done so for years, and know them personally and speak their language, as well as visiting at rare intervals the Mille Lacs and White Oak Point bands, I ought to know something of what I speak. The Red Lake Indians are not suffering much from the evils spoken of, and perhaps need not be removed. The Cass Lake and Winnebagoshish are suffering a good deal, while the condition of the Mille Lac and White Oak Point bands is shocking beyond description."

As has already been remarked, the condition of the several bands is much alike. It is well illustrated in the foregoing remarks concerning the Mille Lac and White Oak Point bands. They have not all reached their level of degradation, it is true, but there are conditions peculiar to each case, which makes it important that the same remedy should be applied to all.

The Lake Winnebagoshish, Cass Lake, and Leech Lake Indians have but little land fit for cultivation. They have no gardens, if we except a few cultivated by the Leech Lake Indians, and their almost sole dependence has been the wild-rice crop, and the small game, which is now fast disappearing.

The construction of dams and reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, authorized by the act of June 14, 1880, and subsequent act of March 3, 1881, has in large measure destroyed their means of support, and if the Indians are not speedily removed they will soon be reduced to a state of pauperism and absolute dependence upon the charity of the Government.

Provision was made in said acts for the payment of damages sustained by all friendly Indians in the construction of said dams and reservoirs, but as yet no settlement has been made with those who suffered loss thereby, for the reason that the Indians have refused to accept the amount of money set apart for that purpose. For a history of this matter, see House Executive Document No. 76, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

Neither the Bois Forte band, in the northern part of the State, nor the Indians of the Grand Portage reservation, in the extreme eastern part, are making any progress.

Of the Bois Forte band, Inspector Thomas recently wrote: "Their condition is no better than it was twenty years ago. Should the Government withhold assistance from them, it would simply mean turning them out to die."

Whisky drinking is their great curse, as with the Mille Lac band, and there is but little hope for them where they are.

The Fond du Lac Indians are self-supporting and are reported to be making some progress. They have no agent with them, and until two years ago there had been no employé of the Government residing on the reservation for years. Their condition is better than that of any of the other bands, but I think it would be well to include them in the plan of consolidation. They are surrounded by the worst influences, and the most recent account we have of them describes them as "living a life of licentiousness and drunkenness. (Inspector Thomas, December 9, 1885.)

All of the Chippewa reservations in this State, except Vermillion Lake, are treaty reservations, and the removal and consolidation, if effected, must be done with the consent of the Indians and co-operation of Congress.

It has been estimated that there are over 200,000,000 feet of pine timber on the Mille Lac reservation; on the Fond du Lac, 300,000,000; on Leech Lake, Cass Lake, Lake Winnebagoshish and White Oak Point, 1,000,000,000 feet, having an aggregate value of from three to four million dollars.

The Grand Portage reservation is rocky and barren, and of not much value, either for timber or agricultural purposes. Probably the Grand Portage and Bois Forte reservations would not bring at public sale more than enough to pay the cost of removing the Indians to White Earth.

The area and population of the several reservations it is proposed to abandon and dispose of are as follows:

Reservation.	Population.	Area.
		Acres.
Lake Winnebagoshish (including Cass Lake and White Oak Point)	2,138	320,000
Leech Lake	.....	94,440
Mille Lac	942	61,014
Fond du Lac	400	100,121
Grand Portage	298	51,840
Bois Forte (including Deer Creek and Vermillion Lake)	698	131,629

Beside the reservation Indians there are about fifteen hundred full-bloods and half-breeds scattered over the State, who ought to be gathered on the White Earth reservation, at least the larger portion of them.

The White Earth reservation, where it is proposed to consolidate and permanently settle the Chippewas, is said to be the garden spot of Minnesota. It has an area of 796,672 acres, or 1,245 square miles. The present population is 1,736. Nearly all of this land is susceptible of cultivation, is well watered and timbered, and every way capable of sustaining a large population.

If the consolidation could be effected, the sale of the abandoned reservations would enable the Department to settle all the Minnesota Chippewas (I do not include the Red Lake Indians) on good lands and give them a fair start in the direction of self-support. A large surplus would be left for educational and other beneficent purposes; the cost of transportation would be greatly reduced, and, what is more than all, the Indians would be rescued from their present peril, and it might be reasonably expected that in time they would rise to the level of their brethren now occupying the White Earth, of whom Bishop Whipple recently wrote, "There is not in the State a more orderly Christian community than the Indians of the White Earth reserve."

While it may not be desirable to remove any of the Red Lake and Pembina Chippewas from the Red Lake reserve, I think it very desirable to include them in the negotiations.

They own and occupy an immense area of country north of White Earth, which has never been ceded to the United States; the Indians still retaining all their original rights in the soil. The reservation is estimated to contain about 3,200,000 acres or 5,000 square miles. Nearly one-half of this vast area is believed to be tillable land. It is occupied by less than 1,100 Indians. The timber on their reservation is of almost incalculable value, and if a portion of it only could be disposed of for the benefit of the Indians it would make them rich. As it is, owing to the remoteness of the reservation from the agency logging operations are being successfully carried on from both sides of the international line, and the northern portion of the reservation especially is being despoiled of much valuable timber without profit to the Indians or the Government. It is impossible to protect the timber from wholesale theft under the present system.

The Red Lake and Pembina bands, occupying this reservation, have much more land than they need, or can possibly make use of, and it is understood they are willing to sell a portion of it.

If it should be found that the White Earth reservation is not large enough to accommodate all the Chippewas in Minnesota, and I think it somewhat doubtful, a portion of the Red Lake reservation might be secured for that purpose, which is an additional reason for having the Indians of that reservation included in the negotiations. In my judgment, the best way to begin this movement is to send a commission to each of the several tribes and bands throughout the State, duly empowered to enter into negotiations with them, as was recently done in the case of the Sioux Indians in Dakota.

Bishop Whipple suggests that a delegation from each of the tribes be invited to visit Washington, but I am of opinion that more could be accomplished by sending a commission to them. I would select for that responsible duty men who are familiar with the history and surroundings of the Indians, and known to be interested in their welfare.

The work to be accomplished is of the utmost importance, involving not only the future well-being of eight or ten thousand Indians, but in no slight degree the material interests of the State in which they reside.

The most favorable conditions exist at White Earth for testing the humane policy of the Government, and in my judgment there should be no delay in beginning the work.

In case of some of the bands, the treaty provisions whereby they have hitherto, for many years, received material aid from the Government have run out, and the gratuities now aggregate more than all that they derive through unexpired treaties.

The sale of the surplus reservations would create a fund which would relieve the Government of this burden, and put the Indians in a prosperous condition.

In view of the importance attaching to this work, the patient and laborious duties that will be required of the commission, and the length of time likely to be involved in negotiating with the numerous bands throughout the State, and visiting the scattered communities of non-reservation Indians, where necessary, I think not less than $15,000 should be appropriated and made immediately available.

The expense of the Sioux commission, to which reference has been made, was about $13,000.

I have had prepared, and herewith transmit, a draught of an item intended for insertion in the Indian appropriation bill, and would respectfully recommend that it be transmitted to Congress with your favorable indorsement.

Bishop Whipple's letter is returned herewith, and two copies of this report are inclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the several tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians, in the State of Minnesota, for such modification of existing treaties with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000, to be immediately available; but any agreement made shall not take effect until ratified by Congress.

FARIBAULT, MINN., October 14, 1885.

I respectfully suggest that you should call the chiefs of the Chippewas to Washington at as early a day as consistent.

(1) They have suffered very great wrongs by the building of dams on the Mississippi.

(2) They own large tracts of valuable pine land, which is year by year injured by fire.

(3) The Indian annuities have expired or will soon.

(4) They have little or no funds for civilization.

(5) The Leech Lake, Cass Lake, Winnibagoshish, Oak Point, Sandy Lake, and Mille Lac Indians can not be protected where they are or led to civilization.

(6) There is abundant land at White Earth of the best quality. The White Earth Indians will for a fair consideration give all that is needed for the other Chippewas.

(7) Great care must be taken to secure only those chiefs who can control their people and whose influence is on the side of civilization.

I do not believe that it is possible for a commission to make a treaty in the Indian country. It can be done at Washington.

I respectfully suggest that great care shall be taken to select proper representatives of the different bands, as well as the interpreters who are to accompany them. If you can do this, you will, I am sure, under God be the instrument of saving this poor race.

Assuring you of my high regard, yours, faithfully,

H. B. WHIPPLE,
Bishop of Minnesota.

MEMORANDUM.

(1) No almshouses for able-bodied men to graduate savage paupers.

(2) All funds except for aged, infirm, and sick, widows and children, to be expended as rewards for labor.
(3) Provision for schools in each settlement.
(4) Lands to be given on actual settlement in severalty and inalienable.
(5) Provision for police administration of law.
(6) White Earth reservation to be kept for their inheritance forever.

Hon. Mr. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserved the point of order on the amendment because it is not authorized by law. It is clearly not a provision of any law or any appropriation bill. All gentlemen must see legislation on appropriation bills is inevitable; that you can not get along without legislation on appropriation bills. You have never done so, and never will unless you adopt a rule which will be absolutely fatal to the efficiency of the public service under the present organization of the legislative branches of the Federal Government. Therefore I do not feel justified myself in insisting on the point of order.

But I wish to say a word, Mr. Chairman, as to the amount proposed to be appropriated. It has been stated the President recommends $15,000, and that the committee has reduced that amount to $10,000, to negotiate with these Chippewas west of the Mississippi River, extending over a portion of country which can be reached in a week. It means the designation of one or more Indian inspectors, and the appointment of two or three gentlemen to go there for the purpose of this negotiation. A committee of the House, consisting of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], and myself, traveled to almost every important agency of the country, and spent enough time to understand the condition of the various Indians located upon these Indian reservations in every section of the United States, taking up over three and a half months, and $4,200 was found to be an ample amount.

I know it is thought to be unwise to object to small appropriations, but there is no reason why a sum should be appropriated beyond the needs and wants of the service. From experience I should judge $5,000 will be more than ample, but I am not inclined to raise any objection to the amount proposed by the committee.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana that I have faith enough in this administration to believe they will not expend more than is necessary. The committee of this House to which the gentleman has referred had unlimited power, and yet he tells us only $4,200 was expended. If it be found that less than $10,000 is required for this purpose no more will be expended than is found necessary.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move an amendment to the pending amendment by inserting, after the word "dollars," the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Iowas:
For interest, in lieu of investment, on $57,500, balance of $157,500, to July 1, 1886, at 5 per cent. per annum, for education or other beneficial purposes, under the direction of the President, per ninth article of treaty of May 17, 1854, $2,875.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the three last words.

While temporarily absent from the Hall a few moments since the gentleman from Kansas, Judge RYAN, renewed the attack made some days ago on the administration for not removing the cattle-men from the Cherokee outlet, although they are there by the consent and in accordance with the wishes of the Cherokee Nation, which nation owns, and by the express terms of the treaty, have the right of occupancy and jurisdiction over that Territory.

The gentleman cites in support of the power and the duty of the President to remove these cattle-men sections 2147 to 2150, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Want of time will not permit of my reading these sections; but it will be seen that these sections only permit or authorize the removal of persons who are in the Territory "contrary to law," or who are there "without authority of law, or whose presence within the limits of the reservation may, in the judgment of the Commissioner, be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians."

I have never controverted these sections of the statute. They have no application to the cattle-men, simply because they are not in the Territory "without authority" or "contrary to law," nor has the Commissioner found that "their presence is detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians." On the contrary, they are there by the consent of the Indians, in pursuance of law, and their presence yields a large revenue to the nation, instead of being detrimental to the Indians.

The gentleman also cites the last paragraph of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1866, which reads as follows:

And all persons not in the military service of the United States not citizens of the Cherokee Nation are to be prohibited from coming into the Cherokee Nation, or remaining in the same, except as herein otherwise provided; and it is the duty of the United States Indian agent for the Cherokees to have such persons not lawfully residing or sojourning therein removed from the nation, &c.

But he is careful not to read the preceding article of the treaty, which is as follows:

The United States guarantee to the people of the Cherokee Nation the quiet and peaceable possession of their country and protection against domestic feuds and insurrections and against hostilities of other tribes. They shall also be protected against—interruptions or intrusions from all unauthorized citizens who may attempt to settle on their lands or reside in their territory.

What? Why, against—

Nobody pretends that the cattle-men are in the Territory either to "reside or sojourn" in the sense these words are used in the treaty. They are not there to "settle" on the lands. They are not "intruders," for an intruder is one who enters without invitation or permission. They have been guilty of no interruption of the Indians, for they wish them to remain and to derive an income from them for the grass otherwise going to waste and a total loss.

Therefore they do not come under the statutes quoted or the treaty provisions requiring the removal of persons unlawfully in the Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. STORM took the floor, and by consent yielded his time to Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. ROGERS. My friend from Kansas falls into two mistakes: First, he ignores or overlooks the fact that for a half century, if not always, the settled policy of the Government has been to preserve the autonomy of these Indian governments, not to destroy them; to encourage them in the management of their local and domestic concerns, not to override their laws and disregard their methods of controlling their own Affairs.

It is only when their laws are in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States or the treaties made that the Government interferes, except to support and encourage them in the act of self-government.

That has been the policy we adopted and pursued to hasten them along the road to civilization.

The next mistake is (and I emphasize that point) in supposing that the Cherokee people hold the lands by mere right of occupancy. They own the fee to these lands. The gentleman shakes his head [referring to Mr. RYAN]; I give you the benefit of my authority for saying so.

Attorney-General Devens (16 Opinions, 430) said of the Cherokee title:

The effect of the conveyance by the United States to the Cherokee Nation of this vast tract of land upon the purchase made by them under the treaty of 1835 was to vest in the tribe a fee-simple to said tract. (Holden vs. Joy, 17 Wallace, 211.) This tribe did not hold this tract of land by the ordinary Indian title, which is one of occupancy only, which may be continued indefinitely. In such case the fee-simple to the land is in the United States. The effect of this sale to the Cherokees was to separate distinctly the tract from the public lands of the United States and vest it in private ownership.

So much for Attorney-General Devens as to the Cherokee title to their lands generally.

In United States vs. Ben Reese, May term, 1879, Judge Parker said of this very outlet:

The Indian title being a bare qualified or determinable fee, with only the possibility of reversion, and not the right of possession, in the United States, all the estate is in the Cherokee Nation of Indians.

He held the same doctrine in United States vs. Rees, 5 Dillon, and also in United States vs. Rogers.

In the latter case Judge Parker said:

The Cherokee Nation of Indians hold what is known as the Cherokee outlet by substantially the same kind of title it holds its other lands. The title to all their lands is obtained by grant from the United States. This title is a bare qualified or determinable fee, without the right of reversion, but only the possibility of reversion, to the United States. This in effect puts all the estate in the Cherokee Nation.

That is what Judge Parker decided last summer after full hearing. That is substantially what every court has decided that has undertaken to pass on the question of the title by which these Indians hold their lands.

The next mistake these gentlemen fall into is this: They say the Indians ceded their lands by the sixteenth article of the treaty of 1866. They did no such thing. There is nothing in the sixteenth article of the treaty that even squints at that. No Attorney-General and no court has so held, so far as I know.

In United States vs. Rogers, Judge Parker, in construing the sixteenth article of the treaty, says:

The plain meaning of this provision of the treaty is that when the United States should desire any of the outlets for the settlement of friendly Indians in the same, the Cherokees would sell the same to such Indians and make title in fee-simple to them for the same, the purchase price to be paid by them, or the Government of the United States for them, to the Cherokees. But until the country or any part of it is so sold and occupied, the right of possession and jurisdiction over all of said country west of 96° of longitude to be retained by the Cherokees.

What can be plainer than this, unless it be the treaty itself, which admits of no other construction? Notwithstanding this, you say the Indians can not permit this land grazed and collect a revenue therefor, and that the presence of the cattle-men is unlawful, because the statute prohibits leases. I deny it. The leases may be void, because the statute makes them so; but the grazing is lawful, and the President is not authorized, under the existing circumstances, to drive these men off this outlet.

Let us see.

In United States vs. Hunter, 21 Federal Reports, page 615, Judge Brewer, of the Kansas court, said, in construing 2116 and 2117 of the Revised Statutes touching the right of the Indians to permit the grazing of their lands, that—

> This imposes a penalty on any one who without the consent of an Indian tribe drives live stock to range and feed on the lands of such tribe. This implies that an Indian tribe may consent to the use of their lands for grazing purposes, or, at least, that if it does consent no penalty attaches; and if the tribe may so consent it may express such consent in writing, and for at least any brief and reasonable time.

In United States vs. Rogers, Judge Parker said of this very outlet:

> The nation has collected at different times a grazing tax from white men who were grazing their stock on it. Individuals have gone out and lived on it and now live on it.

Finally, in United States vs. George Cook (19 Wallace, 59), the Supreme Court said, on the subject of the right of the Indians generally to dispose of the grass on their reservations by grazing it, that—

> The fee was in the United States, subject only to the right of occupancy. This is the title by which other Indians hold their lands. * * * The right of use and occupancy by the Indians is unlimited. They may exercise it at their discretion. * * * These are familiar principles in this country, and well settled as applicable to tenants for life and remaindermen. But a tenant for life has all the rights of occupancy in the lands of a remainderman. The Indians have the same rights in the lands of their reservations. What a tenant for life may do upon the lands of a remainderman the Indian may do upon their reservations, but no more.

I do not suppose anybody will contend that a tenant for life could not permit his lands grazed. If not, the Indians may do likewise say the court. And this decision relates to Indians holding by occupancy only. How much stronger is the case when the Indians hold the fee. It will be remembered the statute invalidating leases was in force when this decision was made. It will be remembered, too, the Cherokees hold their lands by patent. Congress may by legislation override a mere treaty, but the Supreme Court holds it can not destroy vested rights or invalidate patents. These are the errors into which the gentleman has fallen.

I will notice one other point.

On the 3d of December, 1884, the Senate appointed a committee to investigate the whole question of these Indian leases. It was to do its work in the recess, and did do it.

Therefore the Secretary of the Interior said when he came to prepare his report:

> The immediate consideration of the subject of these leases by this Department became absolutely necessary. Had it not been that delay was dangerous, and postponement of action would have been at the risk of much destruction of life and property by Indian hostilities, the prospects of which had greatly alarmed the people of Kansas and other parts of the country, I should have preferred to have refrained from any action looking to a determination of the question of the legality of these leases, or disturbing the status of the matter as it existed when I assumed charge of this Department, until the Senate committee could make its report and action be had thereon by Congress.
> Forced as the Department was by the circumstances and necessities of the case to take prompt action on the matter, I submitted, on July 8, 1885, for the opinion of the honorable Attorney-General certain questions propounded, with a view of ascertaining whether there was any law warranting the making or the existence of said leases.
>
> The Attorney-General held in his opinion, rendered July 2, 1885, that "no general power appears to be conferred by statute upon either the President or Secretary or any other officer of the Government to make, authorize, or approve leases of lands held by Indian tribes," and that "Indian tribes can not lease their reservations without the authority of some law of the United States."
>
> The alleged leases being thus held to be without warrant of law, and as their existence upon the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation had been found to be the main cause of the complaints of those Indians, the President, after full consideration of the matter, declared them void and of no effect, and determined that all unauthorized persons upon that reservation, including the cattle-men, with their herds of cattle, should remove therefrom, and he accordingly issued his proclamation on July 23, 1885, to that effect. I now have the satisfaction to state that the reservation is entirely free from cattle-men and their herds.

The Senate committee addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, asking for information about these leases.

In his response the Secretary says:

> The privilege to graze cattle is but a license, not a lease. It carries no interest in the lands occupied.

He then says he did "treat the leases as amounting to license, to be revoked by the Indians at will."

That is all I have contended for.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROGERS. Can I not have an extension of time?

Mr. WELLBORN. We desire to make progress with this bill, and I must object.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I shall claim the right to reply to the gentleman from Arkansas even on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] has been recognized.

Mr. RYAN. The position taken by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], if it has any legal significance at all, is that the Cherokee Nation have an absolute title in fee-simple to the land in controversy, and that, therefore, they may exercise unqualifiedly such rights over that land as an individual may exercise over lands which he holds in fee-simple. If these Indians hold that sort of a title to the lands, then they have a right—a lawful right—to convey them. If they hold the only estate that there is in those lands, then they have a lawful right to lease them for any term.

It has been held by every authority that has ever passed upon the subject that they hold no such fee—no such unqualified estate in the lands, and that the leases they have made are void. When you admit a person is there for a specific purpose, and then admit that the purpose is in violation of law, I can not see how you escape the provisions of law that provide a person shall be removed from there if he is there in violation of law, for you admit he is there for an unlawful purpose.

Mr. ROGERS. Not in violation of law, but in pursuance of law.

Mr. RYAN. Now, the opinion of the present Attorney-General is simply in accord with the opinion of his predecessors in office. Presumably they are lawyers of a high order. They are selected from all the people of the United States for their great learning and ability as lawyers. The present incumbent, passing upon this very question, says:

> But the present inquiry in substance is (1) whether the Department of the Interior can authorize these Indians to make leases of their lands for grazing purposes, or whether the approval of such leases by the President or the Secretary of the Interior would make them lawful and valid; (2) whether the President or the Department of the Interior has authority to lease for such purposes any part of an Indian reservation.
>
> I submit that the power of the Department to authorize such leases to be made, or that of the President or the Secretary to approve or to make the same, if it exists at all, must rest upon some law, and therefore be derived from either a treaty or statutory provision. I am not aware of any treaty provision, applicable to the particular reservations in question, that confers such powers. The Revised Statutes contain provisions regulating contracts or agreements with Indians, and prescribing how they shall be executed and approved (see section 2103); but those provisions do not include contracts of the character described in section 2116, hereinbefore mentioned.
> No general power appears to be conferred by statute upon either the President or Secretary or any other officer of the Government to make, authorize, or approve leases of lands held by Indian tribes; and the absence of such power was doubtless one of the main considerations which led to the adoption of the act of February 19, 1875, chap. 90, "to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations and to confirm existing leases." The act just cited is moreover significant as showing that, in the view of Congress, Indian tribes can not lease their reservations without the authority of some law of the United States.
> In my opinion, therefore, each of the questions proposed in your letter should be answered in the negative, and I so answer them.

In other words, the Cherokee Nation has no more right to lease their lands than other tribes of Indians. The treaty itself, which has just been read by the gentleman from Arkansas, declares that all persons not authorized by that treaty to go into that Territory are there in violation of law. And then it refers to the other provisions to which I called the attention of the House—namely, the intercourse laws for the remedy. And what is the remedy? The law declares that it shall be the duty of the agent to remove them from the Territory, and the duty of the Executive if necessary to employ the army for that purpose.

Mr. ROGERS. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I renew it. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], I wish to call the attention of the committee to section 2116 of the Revised Statutes:

> No purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian nation or tribe of Indians shall be of any validity in law or equity unless the same be made by treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the Constitution.

Upon the plain language of that statute Attorneys-General Devens and Garland have rendered their opinions to the Interior Department that any attempt to settle upon these lands is contrary to law. Attorney-General Devens said that any attempt, even on the part of the Cherokees, to settle members of their tribe on the Cherokee strip west of 96° was unlawful, and that the military were authorized to eject them. Now, if such settlement was unlawful, and the military was authorized to eject such settlers, I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] if the ejectment of the cattle syndicate from the Cherokee strip would not be lawful to-day? If the Cherokee Nation can not go there, then certainly they can not authorize white men to go. There is no such thing as avoiding this argument. If you eject one class of intruders you must eject the other also. I hold it to be the plain duty of the Government to eject the cattle companies and to eject them now. The Government has taken positive steps, has even used the military to keep the home-seekers out of that Territory, while at the same time it permits the cattle syndicates to remain there. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] admits that the leases are contrary to law.

Mr. ROGERS. I say that the leases are void.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes; the gentleman says that the leases are void, but that the rights acquired under the leases are valid.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not say that.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. How do they get any right, then?

Mr. ROGERS. They get it by license from the Cherokee Nation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is no difference between the word "license" and the word "lease" when used in connection with the occupancy of these cattle-men. Your "license" is only a verbal lease.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The word "license" is not found in this statute, but the word "lease" is. Can the Cherokees do verbally what they can not do in writing? Can they permit what they can not authorize? To so hold would be to annul the law by indirection, and to accomplish by circumlocution that which can not be accomplished directly. The statute is very broad and is intended to cover just this sort of thing, as Attorney-General Garland holds in his opinion.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The debate upon this amendment is closed.

Mr. ROGERS. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I resume where I left off. When the Senate committee called upon the Secretary of the Interior for information he responded, and in that response he made use of this language, "The privilege to graze cattle is but a license, and not a lease." My friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] does not distinguish between these two things. He thinks that if I allow him to come into my house, he has a right to stay there. He has a right to stay there, but only so long as I permit him to stay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in support of that position, the Senate committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, when the present Attorney-General was a member of the Senate, reported upon this very question, and sustained by their report (which I hold in my hand) the views here expressed by the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I can not. I have only five minutes. It is said that these people have no title, and that all the authorities are that way. Where is the authority for that opinion? They are not cited. I thought I had before me when I began this discussion the decision of the Supreme Court where it is held that they do hold a fee, but it turns out that it is only the one in which the court passed upon this direct question of the right of the Indians to graze their lands.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I contend for, that these Indians have a right to permit these persons to come in there on such terms as their council agrees to, but that they have to go out at the will of the Indians. That is what Judge Brewer has said; that is what Judge Parker has said; that is what the Secretary of the Interior has said in this report; that is what the Senate committee have said, and finally and lastly, that is what the Supreme Court of the United States has said in United States vs. George Cook, 19 Wallace, 591.

Now, sir, I can not help it if gentlemen here are unable to distinguish between the question of the right of these parties to graze on these lands and the question of the validity or invalidity of these contracts. That is no fault of mine. I might have no contract at all in writing of any sort, or, if I had one, it might be in violation of the statute and void, and yet I might have a valid license or permission to graze my cattle on that ground; a right which the President of the United States would have no authority to interfere with until such authority was given by Congress.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, this debate has extended so long that I am compelled, with regret, to move that the committee rise.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to withhold his motion. I will occupy only a moment.

Mr. WELLBORN. Well, I will withhold it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] steers clear of the direct decision of Attorney-General Devens in a case where a Cherokee, before the days of the cattle barons, settled upon the Cherokee strip and was removed by the military. He undertakes to make a distinction between a license and a lease, but in this instance, under the language of the statute, I claim that there can be no such distinction, and the Attorney-General so held, practically, when he justified and sustained the action of the military in ejecting Bell. If the license in such cases may be held good, the Government has no power to eject the cattle syndicates or any other intruder. If the Indians have a right to give those parties a "license" for a year, they may give a license for five years (in fact the licenses or leases do run for five years); if for five years, they may give licenses for twenty years or fifty years or one hundred years. That gives them practical control over the Territory, although the Attorney-General holds that—

The fair interpretation of this article would seem to be that the lands to which it refers were absolutely reserved to the United States, upon the conditions therein named, for the settlement thereon of tribes of friendly Indians. The jurisdiction and possession of the Cherokee Nation as to the lands from time to time remaining unsold and unoccupied would give no right to the nation to settle its citizens thereon until the privilege acquired by the United States to settle tribes of friendly Indians "in any part of the country west of 96°" should be satisfied or in some authentic way renounced; and this being so, no person attempting a settlement on these lands can justify under any authority given by the Cherokee Nation. On the contrary, it is the duty, as it is the interest, of the nation to prevent its citizens from making such settlement. It appears that Bell produced no evidence that such authority had been given him. But if he had, and the view above taken be correct, the United States, in the maintenance of their treaty privilege, would have been justified in ejecting him.

Note this language. "No person attempting a settlement on these lands can justify under any authority given by the Cherokee Nation." The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] says they can justify under a license.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of two matrons to take charge of the boarding-schools and two assistant teachers, $2,000; one farmer, one carpenter, and two millers, $3,000, per fifth article of treaty of June 9, 1863; in all, $5,000.

Mr. RYAN. I move to strike out the last word merely for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of this bill. I see that the amount proposed to be appropriated here for these salaries is $5,000, whereas in the current law the amount is only $3,500. The salaries, I believe, are not prescribed by the treaty.

Mr. WELLBORN. The employés are prescribed by the treaty, and if the gentleman will take the number and make the calculation, he will find that $3,500 will not pay them.

Mr. RYAN. Does the treaty provide what the salaries shall be?

Mr. WELLBORN. Not at all.

Mr. RYAN. We paid these salaries at the rate of $3,500, and now you propose to increase the amount to $5,000.

Mr. WELLBORN. Yes, sir; because $3,500 is insufficient.

Mr. RYAN. You think that an inadequate salary.

Mr. WELLBORN. I am satisfied of it, and I examined the matter carefully.

Mr. RYAN. I shall make no motion in regard to the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

NORTHERN CHEYENNES AND ARAPAHOES.

For eighth of ten installments, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, for each Indian engaged in agriculture, in the purchase of such articles as from time to time the condition and necessities of the Indians may indicate to be proper, as per sixth article of treaty of May 10, 1868, and agreement with the Sioux Indians approved February 28, 1877, $30,000.

Mr. SKINNER. I move to amend by inserting between the word "and" and the word "agreement," in line 410, the words "for subsistence as per." That is merely a formal amendment to correct the language.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RYAN. My friend from Texas who has charge of this bill will notice that there is an increase here of $5,000. What is the occasion for it?

Mr. WELLBORN. These Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes are the Indians for whom the appropriation in the last bill was insufficient, so that in the early days of this session we had to authorize the taking of $12,000 from the emergency fund of $50,000 to provide for the support of these Indians. The amount appropriated last year was entirely insufficient, as is shown in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. In my judgment, there ought really to have been an increase of $10,000 instead of $5,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of physician, two teachers, two carpenters, one miller, two farmers, a blacksmith, an engineer, per seventh article of same treaty $9,000; in all, $51,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to inquire whether there is not an increase in this item.

Mr. SKINNER. This is for the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and was explained a moment ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] in answer to an inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. WELLBORN. There is an increase of $5,000. As I have just explained in response to the gentleman from Kansas, the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes were in great destitution, as shown by the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and in consequence of that, by a resolution passed in this House at an early day of the present session, $12,000 was taken from the emergency fund to provide for these Indians, the amount of the appropriation made last year being insufficient.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is, then, altogether an increase of $10,000.

Mr. WELLBORN. Five thousand dollars. I am, however, satisfied that the increase ought to have been $10,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Otoes and Missourias:

For fourth of twelve installments, being the last series, in money or otherwise, per fourth article of treaty of March 15, 1854, $5,000.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such extension of time for the payment of the purchase money under the sale made under an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the remainder of the reservation of the Confederate Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," as he may deem advantageous to said Indians and settlers: Provided, That the interest shall be paid at the rate as now provided by said act; but the time for the payment of the whole of said purchase-money shall not be extended more than five years from the time the said purchase-money became due according to the original terms of sale under said act.

Mr. WELLBORN. I reserve a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I know that the amendment is subject to a point of order; but I had hoped that no one would raise such a point, because the proposition embraced in the amendment is for the mutual advantage of the Indians and the settlers. The authority proposed to be confided to the Secretary of the Interior in this matter is only to be exercised where and to the extent that it shall be seen to be advantageous both to the Indians and the settlers.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state the substance of his proposition?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior, where it is seen to be advantageous both to the Indian and the settler, may extend the time of payment not to exceed five years. This land was sold at a high price. The original law provided that one-third of the purchase-money shall be paid in cash, one-third in one year and one-third in two years. By the provisions of that law the settler was required to make two payments before he could raise any crop on this land. The time for making the payment has passed by, and the settlers are at present unable to pay. Under the provisions of this amendment they will pay interest annually at the rate of 6 per cent. There certainly can be no disadvantage to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest the propriety of inserting in the amendment, after the word "authorized," the words "in his discretion;" otherwise the language of the provision might be regarded as imperative.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. WELLBORN. I shall have to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support, civilization, and instruction of the Shoshones and Bannocks, and other Indians of the Fort Hall reservation, in Idaho Territory, including pay of employés, $18,000.

Mr. SKINNER. I move to add, after the word "dollars," the following: "To be taken from the funds now in the Treasury belonging to the Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Montana: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including pay of traveling expenses of agents, $5,000.

Mr. SKINNER. I move to strike out "pay of," in line 931, so it will read "traveling expenses of agents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Oregon: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including traveling expenses of agents, in Oregon, support and civilization of Indians at Grand Ronde and Siletz agencies, $10,000, and pay of employés at the same agencies, $6,000; in all, $16,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. At Grand Ronde and Siletz agencies there is a body of civilized Indians who have little or no connection with the agency. They apparently hold their lands in severalty, although allotments for that purpose have not yet been made to them. Surely there is no occasion whatever for any agency among these civilized Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I will not submit an amendment, but I trust when my friend's committee come to consider the bill consolidating these Indian agencies and reducing the number he will not forget the case of these Indians at Grand Ronde and Siletz agencies.

Mr. WELLBORN. That is one of the cases to which reference has already been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman's committee will find, I think, a large number of these agencies which are absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. WELLBORN. The Commissioner recommends it to be done in that case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Washington Territory: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including traveling expenses of agents at seven agencies and the support and civilization of Indians at Colville and Nisqually agencies, $16,000.

Mr. RYAN. I move to strike out line 961 in order to suggest to my friend from Texas the current law provides that $16,000 shall also cover incidental expenses. He seems to have left out that provision in relation to the Cœur d'Aléne reservation.

Mr. WELLBORN. It has no connection with this.

Mr. RYAN. After the word "agencies," in line 961, I move to insert:

And pay the employés, including those for Cœur d'Aléne reservation."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please send up his amendment, so that it may be read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would seem to be proper. These Indians are civilized and self-supporting, and the amendment is in harmony with the other provisions.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for; for the purchase, construction, and repair of school buildings; and for purchase of horses, cattle and sheep, goats and swine for schools, $700,000.

Mr. WELLBORN. I submit the following amendment, to come in after "dollars," in line 1011:

Amend by adding after the word "dollars," in line 1011, page 42, the following:

"And of this amount $1,500 may be used for necessary expenses of school superintendents and teachers in holding conferences with the superintendent of schools in relation to school matters: Provided, That the entire cost of any boarding-school building to be built from the moneys appropriated hereby, including furniture, shall not exceed $10,000; and the entire cost of any day-school building to be so built shall not exceed $600: And provided further, That the school year of the Indian schools herein appropriated for shall be held to include all usual and necessary vacations: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall report annually, on or before the first Monday of December of each year, in what manner and for what purposes the general education fund for the preceding year has been expended, and said report shall embrace the number and kind of school-houses erected and their cost, as well as cost of repairs, name of every teacher employed and compensation allowed, the location of each school, and the average attendance at each school."

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SKINNER. I wish to state that really this amendment was originally a part of the bill as it was directed to be reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but somehow or other in revising the proof it was dropped out.

Mr. PERKINS. It is for the purpose of specifying how this money is to be expended.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to present my point of order, I ask that the pending proposition as it stands in the bill, that is, that the text and the amendment may be read together.

I perceive a portion of the amendment is in the law of the present current year, and it may be when taken altogether that it constitutes the law for the present year. I am not able to say at present whether it does or not.

The paragraph and the amendment were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment as read appears to be a proviso to the present law. It makes an appropriation for the support of the day and industrial schools, except as to the first clause, which proposes to appropriate $1,500 of the amount for a conference to be held by teachers of the Indian schools. That is not covered by the present law, and I take it for granted is subject to the point of order, as no such expenditure is provided for. I do not wish to make the point of order upon any portion of the amendment except the first clause of it, which is a new expenditure of money, and I am not able to perceive the exact purpose of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman apply the point of order to the first clause of the bill which has been read in this connection?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; to the first clause of the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to say to the gentleman from Indiana that the present superintendent of Indian education thought it well to allow this $700,000 appropriated by this provision of the bill, to be used in part for having these consultations of superintendents or conferences with those engaged in educational purposes in connection with the Indians, in order that they might be able to perfect and harmonize a system which would be uniform in its operations for all of the Indians who are deriving benefit from these schools.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it seems to me to be most incredible that such a conference is possible. These reservations, as a rule, are so remote from each other and the distances so great between them that it would seem to be absolutely impracticable. You can not bring the teachers together.

For instance, it is not less than 90 miles from Pine Ridge to Rosebud, and the distances between other agencies is equally great in many cases much greater, for the schools are scattered very wide apart from each other all over the country.

Mr. PERKINS. It was not contemplated, however, that any one convention should be held at which all of these persons engaged in the education of the Indians should be assembled.

Mr. HOLMAN. But no material number of them I think could be so assembled.

Mr. PERKINS. And it was thought by the Committee on Indian Affairs that in this clause as it stands now there was authority for this contemplated convening of the teachers, all being for general educational purposes; but yet in order that there might be no controversy as to the assembling of the superintendents for such purposes it was thought better to make it clear and explicit in the bill itself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is my friend able to cite an example of where such an assembly could be held for such purpose?

Mr. PERKINS. Why, here is the school at Carlisle, Pa., and one at Philadelphia, and one at Hampton, where a convention might easily be held, where the teachers could be brought together at very small expense to the Government and very great benefit to the Indians. So also in the Western territory there are a great many of these schools within a radius of two or three hundred miles which could be assembled together in convention and an institute could be held that would be a benefit to the system. As I have said, in order to make what we believe to be the law clear this has been inserted.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me to be entirely impracticable. Besides, the simple system of education devised for the Indian children does not, in my opinion, involve any complicated details or methods such as are given to enlightened communities of people. It is not available for any good to them to spend money in that way, when, in the very nature of things, your educational influences, if exerted to the best advantage, must be in the Indian section of the country. I do not like to raise my voice against anything that promises a benefit to the Indians; but this, to say the least, is a very doubtful advantage.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. But where it is proposed to make an expenditure designed, it seems to me, to remove the whole Indian system of education, which we now employ, from where it ought to be, right there upon the ground where they are to live, I think it is not only unwise but is calculated to produce injurious effects.

I take it for granted, as to the point of order, that the law of the present year, the current year, would be the law for the purposes of the rule touching the appropriation of money.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Chair will observe the law as it is now, the existing law, I think he will find that this expenditure is already authorized; and hence we are not, in reference to this clause, authorizing a new departure or providing for it. We are somewhat limiting the expenditure that may be made by the superintendent of Indian education, and that is all.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, when the Indian appropriation bill was pending before the Committee of the Whole two years ago, I offered an amendment to this portion of the bill to define the duties and limit the powers or authority of the superintendent of the Indian schools. We had constituted a superintendent of Indian schools, and yet there was not a line of law upon our statute-books defining his powers, his duties, or his authority. I attempted by amendment to do that, but it was stricken out on the point of order, as is attempted here. We have a superintendent of Indian schools. The gentleman who has been filling that position, a very intelligent, capable gentleman, has just been transferred to another field of duty, and I hope the gentleman who follows him will be as much interested and earnest as Mr. Oberly has been; but what we ought to have is unity in this system of education. That can be accomplished without expenditure. We have no such thing as a system in our Indian schools.

We have a number of Indian schools scattered here and there from ocean to ocean and from the Gulf to Canada, and yet there is no such thing as a system of schools. An agency school is a unit by itself, an integer. There is no correlation between them; there is no correlation between the different boarding schools; there is no correlation between the contract schools, the Lincoln and Carlisle schools. What we need is to bring these separate schools into unity, harmony, and contact, so that the teachers and agents connected with them can, by comparison of views in regard to their experience, devise the best system for them. I think the amendment is not only in order, but that it is a most beneficent one that will work great good.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan know that at least 50 per cent. of the large sum of money appropriated for the education of the Indians does not go to that purpose at all? There is so much machinery about it, such an army of persons employed, as to absolutely exhaust the money that we intend for the benefit of Indian education. And you will find schools all over the West with a small number of children—ten, fifteen, or twenty—and with a great army of employés—teachers, assistant teachers, and others. It will be seen that we necessarily frame this appropriation bill in such a manner as to give unlimited latitude to the superintendent. The gentleman now in that office is not only thoroughly competent for the position, but he has the welfare of these Indians very much at heart.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand that.

Mr. HOLMAN. He is doing the best he can, but these schools are spread over such an extent of territory that he can not supervise all the persons interested in frittering away the money intended for the education of the Indians. I do not like, therefore, when a scheme comes up, still further to divert the sum appropriated for giving instruction in the simple rudiments of education. I feel it is simply taking that much more from the Indian children.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The fault of the system is this: That while we have a superintendent of Indian schools it is impossible for him to superintend them. They are scattered from ocean to ocean, through the length and breadth of the land, and no superintendent can visit all these schools on all the reservations. But is it not possible the teachers can be brought together at some central points where he can organize a system?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Michigan favors a policy that produces that result. He is in favor of the idea of extending schools to the seaboard and bringing to them children from beyond the Mississippi River. That, of course, renders it impossible that the services of one superintendent can amount to anything. You have brought the children from the proper place for their education and sent them to remote places where they can not be visited.

Mr. CUTCHEON. They are the easiest of all, however, to be visited.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana is insisted on?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To the text of the bill as well as the amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not insist on applying the point of order now to the text of the bill, for the reason that it is not only the present law but also provides a very proper division of the money proposed to be appropriated by the text of the bill. As the bill stands now the whole $700,000 are placed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the Land Office, without any specification as to how the money shall be employed. This cures that to a very large extent, and I think it proper enough and do not make the point of order on that. And I do not see how the point of order ought to be pressed against the text of the bill; for however it may change existing law, it does not produce any injury. My point of order applies to the first clause of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then understands the gentleman from Indiana to confine his point of order to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER].

Mr. HOLMAN. To the first clause of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is an independent proposition and must be treated as a whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to make the point of order against the whole amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion, if the gentleman makes his point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, the amendment must be treated as a whole. But the gentleman from North Carolina may, if he chooses, modify his amendment.

Mr. SKINNER. I will modify it by leaving out the first clause, if the Chair rules the amendment out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must hold that if a portion of the amendment is out of order the whole amendment is. The Chair is clearly of opinion that a portion is out of order. That portion which limits the appropriation the Chair is not now required to pass upon. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. SKINNER. I now submit the amendment with the fifteen-hundred-dollar clause stricken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the amendment which the gentleman from Indiana now presents intended as an amendment to that of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the portion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina which he has now stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And of this amount $1,500 may be used for necessary expenses of school superintendents and teachers in holding conferences with the superintendent of schools in relation to school matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars of which shall be expended for the support and education of one hundred and fifty Indian pupils at the Saint Ignatius industrial boarding school on the Joko reservation in Montana Territory, at $150 each per year, $22,500.

Mr. SKINNER. I have no objection personally to that amendment, although I have no authority to admit it.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, it was agreed to, and Mr. SKINNER'S amendment as thus amended was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the pending provision as now amended begins with these words: "For support of Indian day and industrial schools." I move to amend by striking out the words "day and." In support of this proposition I wish to say a few words.

It will be observed that there are already made in this bill many appropriations which must go to the support of day schools; that is to say, nearly all the specific appropriations in the preceding part of the bill will be expended in part in support of day schools. I do not see how this can be otherwise. Almost all these appropriations which are to be expended under treaty stipulations provide for the employment of a teacher, along with a blacksmith, &c. Hence I say that all the way through the bill day schools are provided for. Now I think that as to this appropriation of $700,000 the whole of it should be confined to industrial boarding schools, which I think should be on the reservations.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. The specific appropriation for day schools outside of appropriations under treaty stipulations is a very small one. It amounted in the last bill, I believe, to only $44,000 in the aggregate. This, as I understand, is simply for the support of day schools for those tribes, and upon those reservations as to which there are no treaty stipulations.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not exactly the result, because there are day schools supported by that expenditure of $44,000 on almost all the reservations.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I suppose the amount which would be appropriated for day schools under this "blanket" clause, as we may call it, would not vary largely from the amount appropriated last year—about $40,000. I think that while the day school is very much inferior in regard to its teaching and in regard to other characteristics to the boarding school, while it is less educational and civilizing in its effect, nevertheless we can plant day schools where we can not plant boarding schools. Where we can not secure the larger and more beneficent form of education we can put out the little $500 school-house, with the little $500 teacher, if you please, and in this way we can reach a mass of ignorance and barbarism which can be reached in no other possible way. One of these schools, as is said by Miss Goodale in the article from which I read yesterday, is an object-lesson in civilization planted in the midst of the tribe, planted upon the reservation where every Indian father and mother can see it. The little white school-house, with its little belfry and bell, is an educating influence, teaching not only the children, but Indian parents as well, the fundamental idea of education and civilization. I hope the Committee of the Whole will not vote to strike out the appropriation for these day schools, because although they are not what we could wish them to be, they are very much better than nothing, and we owe it to these people that they should be continued.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the expenditure of that $44,000 is without any good results. Where Indian teachers, trained at the institutions established for that purpose or educated at home, have been employed in the education of the Indian children I admit that there have been good results, and I would be perfectly willing that this $44,000 be expended in the employment of Indian teachers.

Mr. LONG. Why, then, insist on the amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. What I object to is the expenditure of this money in the way in which it is now being expended. If it were provided that the teachers of these day schools should be only Indian teachers I would have no objection.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That would give a field for the graduates of these different institutions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not propose to press my motion. I withdraw it, and move to amend by inserting after the word "purposes," in line 1008, the words "on the reservation." By way of comparison of the schools on the reservations with those off the reservations I wish to state that we have now in operation on the reservations boarding schools to the number of 60, organized and supported entirely by the Government; we have of boarding schools on the reservations under contract 13. In addition to those we have 6 boarding schools on reservations which are supported in part by the Government and in part by charitable contributions, making the whole number of industrial boarding schools on the reservations 79. Now there is the source through which you will educate these Indians if you educate them at all. If you are to improve these tribes, whether the present generation or the next, it will be through these industrial boarding schools.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What schools would the gentleman's amendment cut off?

Mr. HOLMAN. None at all. It would merely prevent the present system from becoming broader. Here is a new school going up in Colorado, a new school in Santa Fé, outside of the reservation; new schools are springing up all the time. This can hardly be otherwise, with several hundred thousand dollars of expenditure and with a constant pressure on all hands to locate new institutions. We have now seventy-nine of these boarding schools—very efficient schools—some of them model schools. While I have not visited those in the States, I undertake to say the schools on the Pacific coast at Puyallup and on the Jocko reservation are schools which compare favorably with those in the States. I believe that no more orderly or admirably conducted schools can be found among the whites or Indians anywhere. These schools are worthy of encouragement no one can doubt, for they are the source by which you are not only to educate the children of the Indians but to civilize and educate the Indians themselves. Besides, Mr. Chairman, they are connected with the labor in which these Indians are to engage hereafter. The same kind of agriculture and the same kind of labor are imposed as that which they will have to resort to in the future in the cultivation of their own lands. If the system of irrigation is used in the cultivation of the soil when they are ready to engage in these industrial pursuits they will go to work having been accustomed to just that sort of labor.

Mr. PERKINS. I submit the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have offered the amendment.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. It is that it is new legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that point of order comes a little late, after the long discussion which has taken place on the amendment.

Mr. WELLBORN. The gentleman did not give an opportunity to anybody to submit the point of order, as he held the floor all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to believe that the point of order can not be made except in the first instance, and certainly it is not in order to submit the point after an extended debate has occurred upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is now to be understood that after debate you can raise a point of order, then a new rule will have to be adopted in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct and the point of order comes too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment is a limitation on the appropriation itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman reserve the point of order.

Mr. WELLBORN. But the gentleman did make it.

Mr. PERKINS. The amendment has not been read yet from the Clerk's desk. The gentleman from Indiana said he would offer it, and then proceeded to discuss it. The Chair has not stated it to the House, nor has it been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offered it in the usual way.

Mr. PERKINS. It has not been read from the desk, nor has it been stated to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I said I would withdraw the first amendment and offer another.

Mr. PERKINS. It is not before the House.

Mr. STORM. I recollect distinctly that the gentleman in the course of his remarks, without stopping for objection, simply said, "I withdraw the amendment," and then went right on and said he proposed to offer an amendment after the word "purpose"—he went right on and gave no opportunity for raising the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. It has not been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I said I offered it in the usual way. I did not suppose any more formal statement was necessary. The Chair will remember how it was.

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of order having been decided, I suppose we can go on. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the first clause of Rule XVI, the Chair understands it has heretofore been held that unless an amendment has been read from the Clerk's desk or stated by the Chair the point of order could not be properly considered as coming too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that is the opinion of the former Speaker. The Chair will therefore hold that the point of order does not come too late.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to hear the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. It never has been read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, then; let it be read from the Clerk's desk now.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1008, after the words "educational purposes," insert the words "on the reservations."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 182) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; and

A bill (S. 1405) to provide for the study of the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics, and of their effects upon the human system, in connection with the several divisions of the subject of physiology and hygiene, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and of the District of Columbia, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and Indian and colored schools in the Territories of the United States.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, a word now upon the point of order. I hope the Chair will observe that the whole of this language embodied in this portion of the bill is new. No such phraseology has been heretofore employed nor has any portion of it been the law:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, * * * $700,000.

The first terms I have read are a part of the present law for the current year; that is, "for the support of the Indian day and industrial schools."

Now, the question is, and that is the sole question presented here, whether you can impose a limitation upon expenditures of money to be appropriated under the existing rules of the House or not. Here it is proposed to limit this expenditure of money provided in this section of the bill to the Indian reservations, and not beyond. I repeat, then, the question is whether or not, under the existing rules of the House that control the committee, any limitations can be imposed. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a mere statement of the case decides it, for I believe I have never known it to be held under any of the rules of the House that you can not limit by a proposition the expenditure of money; that is, that you can not limit the form or method of the expenditure of the money; and I am not aware that it has been held anywhere that such a limitation is not in order. It is but a limitation upon the expenditure of the money in this case, directing that it shall be expended on the reservations and not elsewhere.

Mr. SOWDEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question, whether the limitation he would impose here would not abolish schools already in existence off the reservation?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the apprehension of my friend from Pennsylvania, and I will state that this has nothing whatever to do with the gentleman's schools in Pennsylvania or anywhere else. It does not touch a school east of the Mississippi River, but it is sought to prevent the abuse which has grown up out of the use of this fund, and to which I have had occasion heretofore to refer in my remarks upon this bill——

Mr. SKINNER. Does it not affect the Albuquerque school in New Mexico?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Or that at Chilocco?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. That is specially provided for, I believe.

Mr. SKINNER. It is not.

Mr. PERKINS. Not in this bill. There is no specific appropriation here for the school at Albuquerque.

Mr. HOLMAN. I took it for granted that as the Chilocco school was specifically provided for the Albuquerque school was also, though it is not necessarily one of the system. However, that is not material, for that is within the limits of a reservation. But as a matter of fact the Chilocco school is not embraced by any subsequent provision. I repeat, however, that does not touch the case, for I myself as well as all other gentlemen would be interested in providing for the Chilocco school exactly in the manner that its best friends could wish it to be provided for.

Mr. PERKINS. But the Chilocco school is provided for in the bill, while the Albuquerque school is not.

Mr. RYAN. And it is not on a reservation?

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, it is right on the edge of a reservation, and it is a case which can be readily provided for in the bill if it should be affected by any such provision as this.

Mr. PERKINS. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I desire, if I can be heard on the point of order, to make a single remark in reference to it. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is subject to the point of order; and if it should be so held, that it is not subject to the point of order, it should be adopted, and if there be any oversight as to the Albuquerque school or otherwise——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the mind of the Chair is in the same condition as to the point of order made upon this amendment as when the Chair decided the question a moment ago. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order and is subject to the point of order of the gentleman from Kansas. The Chair, of course, however, will hear the gentleman if he desires to discuss it, but thought it proper to state that he was of the same opinion upon the subject.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to be heard for a moment only.

Mr. BEACH. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to know whether the Chair has not already decided the point of order and so announced?

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has stated his willingness to indulge gentlemen upon the point of order to see whether there can be a new hearing.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the disorder of this committee has been such that no man upon the floor, sitting even where I do now, can tell what is taking place in the committee. When the Chair indicated that it had decided the point of order it was the first intimation I had of the decision. I failed to hear him, and I certainly should have desired to be heard for a minute or two on this point before its decision; and now, as the Chair has signified his willingness to indulge me for a moment, I wish to make a remark, namely, that so far as this section of the bill is concerned, commencing with line 1001 and ending with line 1011, no man can put his finger upon a provision of law anywhere that authorizes it. And yet it does run in the different appropriation bills. Now, if that be true, that there is no general law authorizing any of these appropriations, then it expires with the close of this year unless the House makes some further provision for its continuance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Indiana made the point of order against the text of the bill to which he alludes some half an hour ago. He subsequently withdrew the point of order, and since then the text has been amended, so that now any point of order which the gentleman may contemplate to the text of the bill could not be entertained.

Mr. CANNON. I am aware of that, but the very statement of the proposition shows, in my opinion, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is in order for this reason, that here is an appropriation which is made without any general law, and if we are making an appropriation without any general law it is in order to determine how that appropriation shall or shall not be expended.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk. As I understand, the bill has been read to the close of line 1011. I offer the amendment to go in at the close of that line.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1011 add:

"Always provided that no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the transportation from or support of Indian pupils or children off their reservations respectively if removed without the free and unconstrained consent of their parents, or those standing in that relation to them by their tribal laws, respectively.

Mr. PERKINS. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to hear the point of order stated.

Mr. PERKINS. The point of order is that the amendment is new legislation.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not new legislation. It simply tells how the money shall be expended.

Mr. PERKINS. It is imposing restriction and limitation not in keeping with existing law.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no existing law on the subject. You have a provision which appropriates a certain sum of money, and this simply provides a limitation on its expenditure, which has always been held to be in order.

Mr. PERKINS. The appropriation bill of last year is the existing law on this subject.

Mr. HISCOCK. The appropriation bill of last year expires with the current year. I desire to say further, it has been always held that any provision was amendable by placing upon it a limitation as to how the money should be expended and providing the channels through which it should be expended.

Mr. RYAN. I suggest to the gentleman to leave out the words "and unconstrained."

Mr. HISCOCK. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that as modified the amendment is in order. It is a limitation on expending the money appropriated, which the Chair is of opinion is in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason I offer this amendment is on account of the assertions that have been made on this floor by gentlemen that these Indian children are kidnaped; that they are forced, by the threat of starvation, from their tribal relations; that in inclement seasons of the year, under duress exercised over their parents or those standing in loco parentis to them, they are taken from their tribes and carried away. I offer this amendment to provide against that.

I assume that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and others would not have deliberately made these charges upon this floor unless they are true. I am in favor of industrial schools, but I do not believe that this is the way to humanize the Indian, to elevate the Indian, by trampling down the relations existing between parent and child. If they are to be educated, educate them upon their reservations. If they are willing to leave their reservations, and if their parents are willing they should leave their reservations, then I am willing they should go. But I am unwilling, I can hardly believe there is a member of this committee who is willing, that by force, by fraud, by coercion, by threat of starvation these children should be taken from their reservations and carried away from their parents. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no authority from the committee to accept the amendment. Yet I may say there is no disposition on the part of the committee to oppose it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the amendment be again read to show what words have been stricken out.

The amendment was again read as modified by striking out the words "and unconstrained."

Mr. REAGAN. I will vote for the amendment as an expression of opinion; that is all I understand it to be. There is no penalty to be enforced by it.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I understand it, my amendment covers all the money appropriated by this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Let it be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment comes in after the amendment already adopted of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER].

The Clerk commenced to read the amendment, as follows:

Always provided that no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be expended.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is right. I now offer another amendment. If it is considered subject to the point of order, I hope the point of order will not be insisted upon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any person who shall remove an Indian child from his or her reservation without such consent shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, and if an officer or agent of the Government, shall be dismissed from the service.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope no point of order will be made on that amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the paragraph the following:

"No portion of said sum of $700,000 shall be expended in the support of schools beyond the limits of the Indian reservations except such sum as the Committee on Indian Affairs shall deem it expedient to expend in support of the Indian school at Albuquerque."

Mr. STORM. I make the point of order on that that it is new legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is simply a limitation on the expenditure of the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order.

Mr. STORM. I desire to hear the amendment read again.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that this provision does not affect the existing schools east of the Mississippi; it simply seeks to prevent the establishment of any more.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is the Forest Grove school in Oregon on the reservation?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is provided for separately.

Mr. STORM. The intention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] may be as he states, but, for the life of me, I can not understand that the amendment does not mean otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the intention of the proposition. If the gentleman can show otherwise, I will modify it.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN; and there were—ayes 33, noes 73.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. PERKINS, to act as tellers.

The tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not insist on a further call.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., and for transportation of Indian pupils to and from said school, $80,000; and said sum shall be disbursed upon the basis of an allowance not exceeding $167, exclusive of transportation, for the support and education of each pupil actually maintained in and supported and educated at said school; but actual cost of transportation and other expenses of such pupils as are sent out of said school among farmers for support and education may be disbursed from said funds; for annual allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt while in charge of said Indian industrial school $1,000; in all, $81,000.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph that it contains new legislation. It provides for an officer, the superintendent of the school, as well as providing his salary. The office does not exist by law otherwise than in the appropriation bill of last year, which will expire on the 30th of June at the time when this bill will take effect.

Mr. RANDALL. I will inquire of the gentleman whether he applies his point of order to the entire paragraph, or only to the part in which Captain Pratt is mentioned by name?

Mr. PEEL. I apply it, Mr. Chairman, not so much to the provision for the salary as to specifying this officer by name; not that I have any objection at all to Captain Pratt, but I think this is a vicious practice, and one which would destroy the very purpose of the new rule. If a provision of this kind can be continued in a general appropriation bill simply because it is found in the appropriation bill for the preceding fiscal year, on the same principle we might go back and take up every solitary item that is in the appropriation bill of last year and incorporate it in this one. My point of order is directed to the fact that this paragraph creates an office and makes this officer superintendent of this school without his being appointed by the authority authorized by law to make such appointments. It takes the appointment out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and makes it by law in a general appropriation bill. I think such legislation is vicious in principle.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. If this were the first time that the name of Captain Pratt had appeared in an appropriation bill in this way I would agree that it had no place here, but it has been in every appropriation bill since 1881, and there is some motive back of this action which prompts the attempt to strike down this gentleman at this time and in this way. I do not accuse the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] of sharing in that spirit, but I understand the opposition to Captain Pratt is inspired by some one in the Indian Office, and I have only to say that when it is attempted in this way to strike down one who has done more for the cause of Indian education than any other man in this country, one who is not only a brave soldier but a skilled educator of the Indian, a pioneer in the cause of Indian education, it will be ill appreciated by the friends of Captain Pratt throughout the whole country, and I beg of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] not to make this point now in order to gratify the spleen or the vanity of some one who perhaps fancies that he has not been fairly treated by Captain Pratt. It is most unfortunate that four appropriation bills have passed this House with Captain Pratt's name in and now for the first time it is found to be a mistake.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, I assure my colleague on the committee that I have no such feeling at all myself. It is principle that I am working for. I think I am right, and therefore I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word upon this point of order. This very provision in reference to Captain Pratt is in the last appropriation bill. If it is to be held that this is not in continuation of existing appropriation, then I submit that over half the items in this appropriation bill would be amenable to the same objection and might be stricken out on the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If this were offered as a new proposition or amendment to this bill the Chair would unquestionably rule it out of order. But the Chair finds a similar provision in the law for the current year, and therefore the Chair is in doubt as to whether this would not fall within the rule that where an appropriation is in continuation of an appropriation for a public object already in progress it may be held to be in order. The Chair very much doubts whether this is not such an appropriation, and for that reason the Chair prefers to submit the question for the determination of the committee, in accordance with the precedents heretofore established as to doubtful and important questions of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a question springing up at the very threshold of the application of the new rule; and the inquiry arises at once whether the rule, in referring to "existing law," means a permanent enactment of Congress or a temporary appropriation.

Mr. LONG. What is the difference?

Mr. HOLMAN. One is simply a law of appropriation, the other is a permanent enactment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit to the Committee of the Whole the question whether the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas is well taken.

Mr. LONG. An appropriation act is a law; and if that object has been previously authorized by a law, whether in the form of an appropriation for a single year or a permanent law extending over many years, it comes within the rule as having been previously authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] the Chair would say that the bill passed last year, known as the current appropriation bill, expires on the 30th of June next.

Mr. LONG. Still this is authorized by that law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has grave doubts on that question, and desires to submit it to the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask to be heard for a moment on the point of order. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in thinking that this is a very important question and one which ought not to be passed over lightly. We are now beginning to operate under the new rule; but while this is true, the phrase "changing existing law" has had a fixed significance in this House for the last ten years without any variation so far as I know. The object of the provision was to prevent any committee on appropriations from reporting in any general appropriation bill a proposition for which there was not specific authority in the terms of a statute. For instance, you provide from year to year in a general appropriation bill for the officers of the Navy. The provision of existing law under which you do this is the law organizing the Navy, creating the offices, prescribing the salaries. If you adopt the other construction, that because there has been an appropriation in the previous bill, upon which no point of order was raised, you therefore have existing law as authority for a new appropriation, then there is hardly anything that is not in order on an appropriation bill.

Take for instance your sundry civil appropriation bill, containing miscellaneous items that vary from year to year, embracing one year some matters and another year other matters. On that bill items are sometimes admitted upon which no question of order is raised because the necessity of the appropriation induces acquiescence on the part of the House. But because we have provided one year for a given item in an appropriation bill gentlemen can not undertake to say that Congress has provided for that as a permanent service.

When the Committee on Appropriations by the rule are required to confine their appropriations to the provisions of existing law, the intent, as I understand, is that they shall provide for a service that has been contemplated by statute. They simply provide the means for the execution of a general law.

Mr. HOLMAN. That expresses it exactly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, it is proposed to insert in this bill a provision to pay a certain sum to a given officer by name. Appropriations of this character have been admitted on some occasions by unanimous consent when they had reference to employés of this House; but I do not think anybody has ever entertained the idea that such appropriations were in order. They have never been so held when the question has been raised, though I have known several instances where the question was raised and subsequently withdrawn out of kindly feeling to our employés.

Mr. WELLBORN. Does the gentleman mean to say that such an appropriation has been held out of order where the employé had been named in a preceding bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir, identically that case, where he had been named in a preceding bill.

Why, sir, this bill relates to the next fiscal year. The bill to which reference has been made provides merely for the current year, and no more; in doing that, it exhausts itself. Mr. Chairman, I do trust that we shall not put upon our rule a construction which will overturn the significance heretofore uniformly given to the terms of the rule by all the rulings made from that chair.

Mr. WELLBORN. Does the gentleman say that this proposition changes existing law?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do, most emphatically.

Mr. WELLBORN. What is the existing law?

Mr. BLOUNT. If there is no law for it, you are putting it there in violation of law.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman answer my question; What is the existing law?

Mr. BLOUNT. If there is no authority for this particular service, then you have no right to insert it in the bill at all; it is new legislation.

Mr. WELLBORN. There is already existing law for the payment to this man by name.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says that there is existing law to pay Captain Pratt by name.

Mr. WELLBORN. There has been for four successive years.

Mr. BLOUNT. But each different time it has been placed on an appropriation bill, and would have been subject to a point of order. That does not make a general law on the subject.

Mr. LONG. Has not this expenditure been "previously authorized by law?"

Mr. BLOUNT. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is simply dallying with words.

Mr. LONG. Those are the words of the rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. They have never been held in any such narrow sense as that. Because you have once gotten through an illegal appropriation in a general appropriation bill and nobody has made any question of order upon it, is it to be maintained that the general law is changed and that you can do the same unlawful thing ever afterward?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understand that there has been an appropriation of this kind made annually for four successive years.

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then the question is whether the term "existing law" in this rule means a continuing law, a law which by its own force continues to operate, or whether it means a mere temporary allowance for a single year.

Mr. BLOUNT. The law creating the service is to be taken as a guide by Congress in making the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has arrived when the question should be submitted to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. This point of order reaches further than members are aware of, and it is one which may come up upon every appropriation bill. It may be the means of increasing largely the expenses of the Government. Therefore those who wish to examine it in all its bearings should have the opportunity to do so carefully and with sufficient time. I therefore ask the gentleman from Texas will make the motion to rise and give us the opportunity we ought to have to consider the point of order.

A MEMBER. Will the gentleman go on with the bill to-morrow?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; I am willing to take it up to-morrow, so far as my vote is concerned.

Mr. WELLBORN. It had been my hope to finish this bill this evening and I so told numerous parties who were waiting in that expectation, but when I am appealed to to allow opportunity to investigate a point of order I do not think it would be right or proper for me to resist such appeal. I therefore move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, Mr. SPRINGER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FORAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. BLAND (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR: Petition of John E. Tebrey; of John R. Darne, of Fairfax County; of William Hough; of J. B. Beans, of Loudoun County, and of Mrs. Ruth Formshil, widow of John Formshil, deceased, of Alexandria County, Virginia, asking that their several war claims be referred to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WEBER: Of citizens of Sanborn, Niagara County, New York.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DUTIES OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MORRILL, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. VOORHEES were appointed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in regard to the proposed extension of the court-house building in Brooklyn, N. Y., and the purchase of additional land for that purpose; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury as to the advisability of increasing the limit of the cost of the public building at Hannibal, Mo., from $93,000 to $130,000; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Connecticut; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

State of Connecticut, January session, 1886.

House joint resolution No. 79, commending the application of Mrs. Betsey A. Mower for allowance of back pension.

Resolved by this Assembly, That recognizing the eminent services rendered to the Union cause during the war of the rebellion by the late Maj. Gen. Joseph A. Mower, we commend to the Congress of the United States the application of his widow, Mrs. Betsey A. Mower, for allowance of back pension, believing that the granting of the same would be a simple act of justice to the family of one of the most gallant and distinguished of the volunteer officers of the Union Army.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and hereby is, requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolution to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
Office of Secretary of State, ss:

I, Charles A. Russell, secretary of the said State of Connecticut, and keeper of the seal thereof, and of the original record of the acts and resolutions of the General Assembly of said State, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of the resolution commending the application of Mrs. Betsey A. Mower for allowance of back pension with the original records of the same now remaining in this office, and have found the said copy to be a correct transcript thereof and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford this 17th day of March, 1886.

[SEAL.] CHARLES A. RUSSELL,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWELL presented a resolution adopted by Vineland (New Jersey) Grange No. 11, remonstrating against the passage of the bill proposing to increase the postage on fourth-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Warren County, New Jersey, praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Knights of Labor of Phillipsburg, N. J., favoring the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAXEY presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Austin and Marshal, in the State of Texas, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a petition of various citizens of Wood County, Texas, addressed to the Senators and Representatives from the State of Texas, but evidently designed as a petition to Congress, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of Galveston Harbor. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Lincolnville, Me., and a petition of Local Assemby No. 4639, Knights of Labor of Maine, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, favoring an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Licking River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Kentucky, favoring the passage of a bill preventing the retirement of Rear-Admiral James E. Jouett, United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kentucky, praying for the passage of a bill for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Tracy City,

Grundy County, Tennessee, and a petition of Knights of Labor of Campbell County, Tennessee, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COLQUITT. I present a petition praying for the favorable action of the Congress of the United States upon the bill to prohibit the sale of liquor within 1 mile of the Soldiers' Home grounds. The petition is signed by the Board of Commissioners, by General Sheridan, by the Adjutant-General, by the Surgeon-General, by General Hunt, the governor of the Soldiers' Home, and other officers of rank and eminence, and by five hundred and odd citizens living within the territory marked out in the bill. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting Congress to appropriate money to make a continuous navigation from Chincoteague Bay, in Virginia, to Delaware Bay, at or near Lewes, Del.

Whereas by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed July 5, 1884, a survey has been made under the direction of the War Department of the United States of Lewes Creek and Rehoboth Bay, Delaware, Assateague and Chincoteague Bays, Maryland, with a view to form a continuous inland navigation from Chincoteague Bay, in Virginia, to the Delaware Bay, at or near Lewes, Del., and a report most favorable in its character, showing the importance to commerce of the work, and the small amount of money necessary to complete it, has been submitted to the Secretary of War by the engineers in charge; and

Whereas the importance of this projected work to a large number of the people of this State is apparent: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, urgently requested to use all honorable means to obtain an appropriation from Congress to prosecute said work to completion.

JOSEPH B. SETH,
Speaker of the House of Delegates.
E. M. WARFIELD,
President of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of 7 clergymen, 10 physicians, 6 lawyers, 15 teachers, 54 business men, and 9 officers of temperance and other societies, of Bates and Vernon Counties, in the State of Missouri, praying for the enactment by Congress of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury. As the bill has already passed the Senate, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition that was sent to my colleague [Mr. VEST], who is necessarily detained from the Senate by reason of illness. It is a petition of Knights of Labor of Kirksville, Mo., praying that liberal appropriations be made for the construction of works of internal improvements, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Colchester, Conn., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of 4 clergymen, 5 physicians, 3 lawyers, 20 teachers, 67 business men, and 12 officers of temperance and other societies of Rice and Goodhue Counties, Minnesota, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of Knights of Labor of McKean, Pa., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 55 citizens of Cochranville, Pa., praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the District Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Sons of Veterans of Beaver Falls, Pa., favoring the passage of an act granting a pension to Elizabeth Sirwell, widow of Col. William Sirwell, late colonel of the Seventy-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present the petition of 150 settlers on the Des Moines River lands, praying for the passage over the veto of the President of the bill recently passed by both Houses and vetoed by the President to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands. The petition is brief, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without the names and without being read.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens and settlers upon Des Moines River land of the Des Moines Valley and State of Iowa, hereby very respectfully and earnestly petition your honorable body to take into consideration once more the settlers' bill, and pass the same over the veto of the President.

Our reasons for petitioning thus are these: We believe that the President, in refusing to sign our bill, has done an unjust and unrighteous act, inasmuch that it has deprived us of the opportunity of presenting our case before the proper tribunal; and by so doing, has deprived us of our rights and allowed our homes to remain in jeopardy and ourselves a prey to land-grabbers and thieves. And by so doing he has tacitly sustained these river-land thieves to continue persecuting and driving us from our homes. For further cause, we wish to say that these lands were settled in good faith by us, believing them to be Government lands; and resting upon that belief, the settlers have built up homes after years of persecution, until now all that they have are on these lands. Having confidence, however, in the rectitude of our purpose, the justice and righteousness of our cause, we believe that should our case come before the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner directed by the settlers' bill, the true facts will be brought to light, the dark clouds removed from our homes, while the rightful owners will have possession of their own. For the granting of this petition we most humbly pray.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I also present the petition of 450 citizens of Webster County, Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, which was passed by both Houses and vetoed by the President. I move that this petition be printed, without the names, in the RECORD.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of Webster County, Iowa, believing that the measure recently passed by your honorable bodies to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands is a just one and should become a law, and believing that the President's veto of the said bill was made through ignorance of its true merits, and after an only partial investigation of the facts in relation to this question, respectfully pray your honorable bodies that you will pass this bill over the President's veto, that the same may become a law, and this long controversy, of over thirty years' duration, may be brought to a final termination. And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of 22 clergymen, 16 physicians, 9 lawyers, 80 teachers, 168 business men, and 45 officers of temperance and other societies of Davis, Wapello, Monroe, and Mahaska Counties, Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Honey Creek (Iowa) monthly meeting of Friends, praying for the passage of Senate bill 355, to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a petition of mail-carriers of Lincoln, Nebr., which is informally addressed to the Senators from Nebraska, but evidently intended for the Senate, praying for the passage of a bill constituting eight hours a day's labor for letter-carriers. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Tacoma, Wash., remonstrating against the removal of duties on coal and lumber; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I present three petitions of Knights of Labor of Richmond and Chesterfield, in the State of Virginia, under the seal and signatures of the officers of the lodges, and as they all pray for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal I move their reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Carbon and Frankfort, in the State of Indiana, praying that liberal appropriations be made for public works, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Weiser city, Idaho, remonstrating against the proposed division of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CALL. I present a memorial of pilots on Apalachicola Bar, Apalachicola, Fla., remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the abolition of compulsory pilotage. This memorial is signed by Robert F. Yont, Joseph Buzzet, Domingo Cattanitti, and other pilots upon that bar. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a communication in the nature of a petition, sent to me by Horace Anderson, of Ellerslie, Hernando County, Florida, praying for the forfeiture of the land grant made in 1856 to the State of Florida for the construction of a railroad from Amelia Island to Tampa, in the State of Florida. The letter states that by the inclosed copy of a letter written by the writer to S. J. Wailes, commissioner, his grievances will be seen in full, which is only one case out of many others caused by this land grant in which the honest settlers of the country have been in every way oppressed and injured and deprived of their rights to settlement and homestead. This case, he states, is one that demands the action of Congress. I move the reference of the paper to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Niagara County, New York, praying that liberal appropriations be made for internal improvements, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented resolutions adopted by Knights of Labor of Labette County, in the State of Kansas, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and expressing views in favor of the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented a petition of 16 clergymen, 2 physicians, 6 lawyers, 5 teachers, 76 business men, and 20 officers of temperance and other societies of Monmouth County, New Jersey, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN. I present a petition of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, favoring the efforts which have been made to secure a favorable consideration of the claims of yellow-fever inoculation by our Government, and urging the passage of the bill providing for a medical commission to investigate this prophylactic measure. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of certain members of local posts of the Grand Army of the Republic of Kansas, praying the passage of what is known as the "Weaver bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of the Trevellick Assembly, of Parsons, Kans., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for the passage of the legislation recommended by the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BECK presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Frankfort, March 16, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a duly certified copy of a resolution of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, entitled "Resolution requesting Kentucky members of Federal Congress to use their influence to secure an appropriation from the Government to lock and dam the Licking River in Kentucky," approved February 25, 1886.

Very respectfully,

J. PROCTOR KNOTT.

Hon. J. B. BECK, Washington.

[Resolution No. 31.]

Resolution requesting Kentucky members of Federal Congress to use their influence to secure an appropriation from the Government to lock and dam the Licking River in Kentucky.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

SECTION 1. That our Senators and Representatives in the Federal Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use their influence in securing an appropriation from the Federal Government for the purpose of locking and damming the Licking, Cumberland, Green, and Trade Water Rivers in Kentucky.

CHAS. OFFUTT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JAMES R. HINDMAN,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved February 25, 1886.

J. PROCTOR KNOTT.

By the governor:

J. A. MCKENZIE, Secretary of State.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, Office of Secretary of State.

I, J. A. McKenzie, secretary of state for the Commonwealth aforesaid, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution No. 31, approved February 25, 1886.

In testimony whereof I have caused my official seal to be hereunto affixed, at Frankfort, this 12th day of March, A. D. 1886.

[SEAL.] J. A. MCKENZIE, Secretary of State.

Mr. BECK presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Frankfort, March 16, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a duly certified copy of a resolution of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky entitled "A joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to secure the passage of a bill preventing the retirement of Capt. James E. Jouett, of the United States Navy," approved March 8, 1886.

Very respectfully,

J. PROCTOR KNOTT,

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, Washington, D. C.

Joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to secure the passage of a bill preventing the retirement of Capt. James E. Jouett, of the United States Navy.

Whereas the conspicuous and laudable heroism displayed in battle by Capt. James E. Jouett, of the United States Navy, on the occasion of his capture and destruction of the armed vessel Royal Yacht, at Galveston, Tex., on the night of November 7, 1861, and on the occasion of his capture of the war steamer Selma, at Mobile, Ala., on the 11th of August, 1864, not only won for him the admiration of the people of this Commonwealth, in which he was born and reared, but justly entitle him to the thanks of Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use all honorable means to procure the passage of such a bill as will, in proper acknowledgment of his distinguished gallantry on those occasions, prevent his retirement from active service, unless upon his own application, until he shall have been fifty-five years in the Navy.

CHAS. OFFUT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
R. G. HAYS,
Pro tempore Speaker of the Senate.

Approved March 8, 1886.

J. PROCTOR KNOTT.

By the governor:

J. A. MCKENZIE, Secretary of State.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, Office of Secretary of State.

I, J. A. McKenzie, secretary of state for the Commonwealth aforesaid, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution No. 36, approved March 8, 1886.

In testimony whereof I have caused my official seal to be hereunto affixed, at Frankfort, this 12th day of March, A. D. 1886.

J. A. MCKENZIE, Secretary of State.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2428) for the relief of V. F. Gorrissen, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 173) to establish a navy-yard and depot of supplies on the Mississippi River at Algiers, or at some point between Algiers and Port Eads, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Martha J. Coston, praying for the opening of Vermont avenue, in the city of Washington, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 852) to provide eight magistrates for the District of Columbia, who shall have civil and criminal jurisdiction as therein provided; to define the jurisdiction, powers, and functions of said magistrates; and to abolish the police court and office of justice of the peace in and for said District, &c., to report it adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. As a substitute for the bill just indefinitely postponed I report a bill to create four police magistrates for the District of Columbia, to define the jurisdiction, powers, and functions of said magistrates, and provide a jury for the police court, and for other purposes; and I ask that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from Tennessee will allow me to ask him when did the committee direct that the first bill that he reported should be indefinitely postponed? I had not so understood.

Mr. HARRIS. That is precisely what I understood the action of the committee to be this morning.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I was in committee all the time. My understanding was that the bills were to be reported back with the request to be printed and recommitted. That was my understanding; and I never heard but one bill read in committee.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill was postponed indefinitely to prevent the necessity of reprinting a long bill, for which the committee had, as I understand, instructed me to report a substitute. I will ask then, as there is a misunderstanding upon the part of one member of the committee, to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 852 was indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote will be reconsidered.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will reply to the Senator from Tennessee by stating to him very clearly that the bill which was indefinitely postponed was not read in the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. That is all very true, but it was understood by the committee. However the object of the Senator is quite accomplished by my suggestion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Certainly it is, but I do not like the statement that I am doing what the committee would not otherwise have done as an exception to the rule of the committee. The bill was not read in committee.

Mr. HARRIS. I regret that any statement of mine should be distasteful to the Senator.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is not.

Mr. HARRIS. But I state the fact.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. We understand each other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the motion to reconsider will be agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I want the vote reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been done.

Mr. HARRIS. Now I will offer the bill that I proposed to report as a substitute as an amendment to Senate bill 852, and I ask that the amendment be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there is no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no necessity for reprinting the original bill.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 274) for the relief of John A. Morris, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 654) declaratory of the meaning of section 3 of the act of June 16, 1882, for the relief of Howard University, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1516) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Winona, State of Minnesota, to the opposite shore of said river, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1491) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, State of Minnesota, to the opposite shore of said river, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 576) to authorize the Chicago, Freeport and Saint Paul Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Saint Croix River (or Lake) at any accessible point between Prescott, Wis., and Taylor's Falls, Minn., reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1916) authorizing the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from the State of Colorado to the Territory of Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McPHERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1917) for the relief of certain drafted men; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1918) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time of payment to purchasers of lands of the Otoe and Missouria and of the Omaha Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1919) to authorize the purchase of additional ground adjoining the United States court-house and post-office building at Saint Paul, Minn., the erection of a bonded warehouse, and the repair of the existing United States building at said place, and appropriating money therefor; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury approving and recommending this measure; which I move be referred with the bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1920) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Minneapolis, Minn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1921) to amend the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed the 3d day of March, 1803; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1922) to amend chapter 18 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1923) to improve the consular service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1924) to amend section 3962 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1925) to provide for the purchase of two adjustable steam-docks, one to be placed at Pensacola and the other at Key West, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1926) to increase certain pensions; which was read once by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be read at length. I should like to hear it read.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be placed on the pension-roll the names of all pensioners of that grade of total disability where the pensioner now receives $8 per month at the rate of $25 per month; and all of those pensioners who receive over $8 per month and not over $16 per month shall be placed on the pension-roll at the rate of $30 per month, to take effect from the passage of this act.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 5,000 additional copies of the revised list of papers touching unpaid claims on account of French spoliations prior to January 31, 1801, transmitted by the President of the United States on the 17th instant, be printed; of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House, and 2,000 for distribution by the Department of State.

VICTOR BEAUBOUCHER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. EVARTS. I beg to ask attention to Calendar number 356, which is a House bill that was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was reported by me by direction of that committee in favor of the bill without amendment. I submitted a brief report in favor of it, which was presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 356, being the bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beaubouchcr.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of State to audit the expenditures of Victor Beaubouchcr, late consul of the United States at Jerusalem, made in 1866 and 1867, and to determine what allowance, if any, shall be made to him upon principles of justice and equity; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to Beaubouchcr such sum as may be awarded by the Secretary of State, not to exceed $4,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like either to hear the report read or some explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. EVARTS March 17, 1886:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beaubouchcr, having considered the same, beg leave to report it back with the recommendation that it pass, submitting herewith the report made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs (H. R. Report No. 28, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), in which they concur, and which they ask may be reprinted and made a part of this report.

[House Report No. 28, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beaubouchcr, beg leave respectfully to report:

Victor Beaubouchcr was, at the time concerned, the consul of the United States at Jerusalem. He received the appointment from President Lincoln, although still a French subject, in recognition of gallant services in the Union Army. In that cause he had lost one of his legs.

In the winter of 1866-'67, the colony of misguided Americans who had been led to settle at Jaffa, under the fanatic lead of Rev. G. J. Adams, were brought to the verge of destitution. They had neither food nor money, nor resources to procure either. Under these circumstances, Beaubouchcr came to their rescue and made constant trips between Jerusalem and Jaffa, and rendered all the aid he could. He made advances, to relieve their immediate necessities and to aid their escape from Palestine, to the amount of $3,618.80 in gold. He asks the Government to repay this without interest.

His application, indorsed by Secretary Fish, was transmitted to Senator Sumner, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. A bill, introduced by Mr. Sumner, granting the relief sought, was passed in the Senate. It seems never to have been pushed in the House, Beaubouchcr's infirmities and health and possible absence preventing him from giving personal supervision to his case.

The same causes, possibly aided by a feeling of discouragement not unnatural to his race or to any one else under the circumstances, seems to account for subsequent delay in its prosecution. The committee find in this delay nothing to invalidate their faith in the justice of Beaubouchcr's demand, which at the time received the indorsement of the American minister at Constantinople, Mr. E. Joy Morris; Governor Perham, of Maine, and Mr. Israel Washburn, collector of the port of Portland, who seem to have had a personal acquaintance with and regard for the claimant.

The unhappy colonists, to the number of forty or more, mainly Maine folk, declared their appreciation and gratitude for his services in a letter to him, now in the files of the State Department.

And, as before noted, the Department itself recommended some appropriation to reimburse him for his outlays. Under these circumstances, the committee have no hesitancy in recommending the passage of the accompanying bill, which leaves the adjustment of the amount, under fair limits, and all other details to the discretion of the Secretary of State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORRIS COUNTY RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1377) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad Company.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the authority heretofore granted to the Central Railroad of New Jersey to construct a railroad through the property of the United States used by the Government as a powder depot near Dover, N. J., be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

LIVE-STOCK HIGHWAY.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 721) to establish a national live-stock highway, and to promote commerce in live-stock between the States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in section 1, line 6, before the word "settlement," to strike out the word "sale," and after the word "settlement" to strike out the words "pre-emption, or location for any purpose whatever, under any law" and to insert "and sale under the land laws;" so as to read:

That the public lands in range numbered 41, along the east line of the State of Colorado, it being a fractional range, averaging about 2 miles in width, be, and is hereby, reserved from settlement and sale under the land laws of the United States for the period of ten years, and is hereby set apart as a national live-stock highway for such period.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOURTEENTH KANSAS CAVALRY VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 352, being Senate bill 387.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 387) to define the status and for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of certain recruits for the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry Volunteers who were killed at Lawrence, Kans., August 21, 1863, by guerrillas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

Mr. DAWES. A few days since, when the Calendar was up, Order of Business 72, being Senate bill 367, was objected to by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who will make no further objection, and I ask that the bill may be considered now. It is a bill which has passed both Houses twice, and the same bill has at this session passed the House of Representatives, and is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 367) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill which has passed that branch precisely like this may take the place of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the House bill of the same tenor will be substituted, and the House bill will now be considered as before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report on the Senate bill, which is the same in terms.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAWES January 20, 1886:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 367) "authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy," beg leave to report the same to the Senate, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This recommendation is based upon facts which are presented in a report made to the House of Representatives, Forty-seventh Congress, which report was adopted by the Committees on Naval Affairs of both branches Forty-eighth Congress, and is also adopted and made a part of this report. (Appendix.) To summarize the case, it appears that Mr. Randall entered the service in July, 1861, as acting master; that he was an officer of conspicuous gallantry and ability, winning promotion from grade to grade until, in March, 1865, he became a lieutenant-commander, with which rank he was honorably discharged from the volunteer service December 19, 1865. Less than a year later he was appointed in the regular Navy, and, beginning again at the foot, had, in 1870, reached the rank of lieutenant. After twelve years' service in that grade, he was ordered before a medical board to be examined for promotion, and was rejected for the reasons stated in the following extract from the report of the board:

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1882.

[Extract from the report of the medical examining board for promotion in the United States Navy, in the case of William P. Randall, lieutenant United States Navy.]

Each member of the board then proceeded to make a careful physical examination of the candidate, which being concluded, the board decided thereupon as follows: We hereby certify that Lieut. W. P. Randall, United States Navy, is not physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea, and do not recommend him for promotion. He has right inguinal hernia, which, according to a written statement made by Medical Director Charles Martin, United States Navy, and which was presented to the board, occurred in the line of duty on board the United States ship Cumberland February 22, 1862. He is nearly deaf in left ear; he is green blind, together with a general feeble color sense.

J. M. BROWNE,
Medical Director and President.
DAVID KINDLEBERGER,
Medical Inspector and Member.
JOHN C. SPEAR,
Medical Inspector and Member.

JOHN C. DULIN, Recorder.

The committee is especially impressed with the fact that the disabilities which prevented his promotion to the rank he now seeks had existed during practically the entire period of his service; that the hernia and deafness were caused by injuries received in the line of duty aboard the Cumberland, and that throughout his twenty years of service they had not interfered with the prompt and entirely efficient performance of his whole duty.

APPENDIX.

Lieutenant Randall has recently failed of recommendation for promotion to the grade of lieutenant-commander on the active-list because of physical infirmity wholly. But for these infirmities, which are mainly the direct results of hard and faithful service in war, Mr. Randall would have been unanimously recommended for promotion by the examining board.

The record of this officer is an admirable one. The retired-list of the Navy was created and intended for the protection of just such men as Mr. Randall, and we could wish that it contained no names less worthy than his.

Mr. Randall was an experienced navigator at the opening of the war of 1861, and was about to sail in command of a whaling ship at that time. He gave up his command, offered his services to the United States, and on the 24th of July, 1861, was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy. He was ordered to the Cumberland, and served on that vessel at the capture of Forts Clarke and Hatteras, and in the contest with the Merrimac, at Newport News, March 8, 1862, he was in command of the after pivot-gun, which was the last gun fired on the ship in that memorable contest. On the 28th of May, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant, and served on the gunboat Port Royal through the summer of 1862. From January 26, 1863, he commanded the United States bark Pursuit, until August 12, 1864, and from that date he commanded the United States bark Restless until February 23, 1865, when he took command of the United States steamer Hendrick Hudson, and remained in that command until March 9, 1865.

On the 17th of March, 1865, he was promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant-commander. On the 19th of December, 1865, he was honorably discharged from the United States Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander.

On the 22d of November, 1866, he was appointed as acting master; March 12, 1868, he received a commission as ensign in the regular Navy, and was promoted as lieutenant March 11, 1870.

Since that time Mr. Randall has served in that rank, and has rendered very valuable service to the Government, as appears by his record herewith reported. His record is without spot or stain. He was desirous of remaining on the active-list, but when the time for his promotion came he was found mentally and morally qualified, but physically disqualified, and was retired as a lieutenant. We think that his service and record entitle him to retirement as lieutenant-commander, the rank which he reached on his own merits and record in the volunteer service, and before he entered the regular Navy.

In proof of his worth and merits as an officer, we append hereto a letter signed by members of the retiring board and other officers of the Navy. Such an indorsement ought to entitle Mr. Randall to favorable consideration.

NAVAL RECORD.

Lieut. William P. Randall was born in New Bedford, Mass. In 1861 was about to sail in command of a whale ship when the war commenced; was furnished with a certificate signed by the president of every insurance office in the city, to the effect that their offices would insure any vessel under his command at the lowest rates of insurance; without further indorsement was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy July 24, 1861, and ordered to the United States ship Cumberland, serving on that vessel at the capture of Forts Clark and Hatteras, and afterwards in the engagement with the Merrimac at Newport News, March 8, 1862, at which time he had command of the after pivot-gun (which was the last gun fired from that ship). May 28, 1862, promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant and ordered to the gunboat Port Royal, Commander George W. Morris, which vessel did good service in the James River through the summer of 1862, and joined the East Gulf squadron in the fall of that year. January 26, 1863 (being at that time the executive officer), detached from the Port Royal and ordered to command the United States bark Pursuit; commanded this vessel until August 12, 1864, when he was detached and ordered to command the United States bark Restless; these vessels were engaged in blockading the coast of Florida, and while commanded by Lieutenant Randall did much injury to the enemy, for which he received two complimentary letters from the admiral commanding (Admiral Stribling), with orders to read them on the quarter-deck at muster. February 23, 1865, took temporary command of the United States steamer Hendrick Hudson (Restless undergoing repairs at Key West), and went to Saint Mark's for General Newton, United States Army, and staff, March 9, 1865. Promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant-commander March 17, 1865; detached from United States bark Restless and ordered to take the prize steamer Ruby to New York; arrived in New York with the Ruby April 14, 1865, and waited orders until August 17, 1865, when he was granted four months' leave of absence; on December 19, 1865, was honorably discharged from the United States Navy, with the rank of lieutenant-commander. October 30, 1865, presented himself to the examing board at Hartford, Conn., for admission to the regular service, and was rejected on account of injuries received in the line of duty during the engagement between the Cumberland and Merrimac, but obtained permission from Washington for examination. He presented himself the second time November 22, 1866, and on December 7, 1866, received an appointment as acting master on temporary service, and was ordered to the United States steamer Peoria, which vessel went to the West Indies and returned with the yellow fever on board. Detached from her in Norfolk, Va., and went to the hospital July 29, 1867; was on sick-leave until September, 1867, when he was ordered to the United States receiving ship Ohio, March 12, 1868 (three years and three days after receiving his appointment as a volunteer lieutenant-commander). He received a commission as ensign in the regular Navy October 12, 1868. Detached from the Ohio and ordered to command the United States steamer Leyden December 18, 1863. Promoted to master January 27, 1869, and detached from the Leyden and ordered to the United States steamer Narragansett. Joined the Narragansett in Havana, March 17, 1869. In July the Narragansett went in quarantine at Portsmouth, N. H., with yellow fever on board, when he was detached and ordered to the Boston navy-yard. September 1, 1869, ordered to command the United States steamer Palos. In October, 1869, was detached from the Palos and took command of the United States steamer Leyden. Commissioned as lieutenant March 21, 1870. May 18, 1870, detached from the Leyden and ordered to the monitor Saugus. Joined the Saugus at Havana June 4, 1870. September 30, 1870, detached from the Saugus and ordered to command the United States steamer Mayflower. Detached from the Mayflower November 3, 1870, and ordered to the United States receiving ship Ohio, navy-yard, Boston. May 5, 1871, temporarily detached from the Ohio and ordered to Key West, Fla., as executive officer, to assist in bringing the Saugus to Philadelphia. June 22, 1871, returned to the Ohio. September 15, detached from the Ohio and ordered to the United States steamer Iroquois. January 15, 1872, detached from the Iroquois and ordered to the United States steamer Canandaigua. August 4, 1874, detached from the Canandaigua at Key West, and sent home by medical survey (with Chagres fever) on sick-leave. November, 1874, ordered to the ordnance department, navy-yard, Boston. June 10, 1875, ordered to torpedo station, Newport, R. I. October 10, 1875, detached from torpedo station and ordered to the United States receiving ship Ohio, navy-yard, Boston. October 28, Ohio's crew all transferred to the receiving ship Wabash. April 16, 1877, granted six months' leave of absence. October 15, 1877, ordered back to the United States receiving ship Wabash. September 2, 1878, ordered to the Ranger, Asiatic station, as executive officer. Detached from the Ranger February 20, 1880. March 10, 1881, ordered as member of a board to organize search for the steamer Jeannette. April 7, 1881, ordered to special duty under the Bureau of Navigation. Placed on the retired-list of the Navy February 15, 1882.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 17, 1882.

In consideration of the good record and long service of Lieut. Wm. P. Randall, United States Navy, and as the disabilities that prevented his promotion on the active-list are physical and incurred in the line of duty, the undersigned believe that if he is placed on the retired-list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander it will be an act of justice to a deserving officer who held this rank during the late civil war.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the condition, if the Senator from Massachusetts will inform us, of the naval retired-list at this time?

Mr. DAWES. I am unable to answer that question. The simple fact in this case, and the only ground upon which this relief can be properly asked, is this: This man went into the volunteer navy and for his gallantry rose to the office of lieutenant-commander. He then retired with the volunteer navy and was re-appointed in the regular Navy at the foot of the list. He then rose to the point of lieutenant. When he came to be examined for promotion to the grade of lieutenant-commander it was discovered that he was physically disabled, and that that physical disability originated in the volunteer service upon the Cumberland in its last battle with the Merrimac; that he there received an injury which developed into an incapacity for promotion at that time, and he was retired as lieutenant. If it had not been for that circumstance, that injury, he would have then been retired as lieutenant-commander. All the members of the board have signed a recommendation that he be retired as lieutenant-commander, as he would have been retired according to existing law if it had not been for this injury which he received. He was the man who fired the last gun on the Cumberland in its fight with the Merrimac, and received the commendation of all the officers, including Admiral Worden. That is the ground.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest an amendment. The bill reads:

That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

It should be "and to place him on the retired-list with that rank." He can not appoint a man on the retired-list.

Mr. DAWES. That is right.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "lieutenant-commander," in line 6, it is proposed to insert "and to place him," and after the word "Navy," in line 7, to insert "with that rank;" so as to read:

Appoint Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, a lieutenant-commander, and to place him on the retired-list of the Navy with that rank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. The title of the bill should be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is an amendment to the title proposed?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the title read.

The SECRETARY. "A bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy."

Mr. COCKRELL. It should be "A bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander in the United States Navy, and place him on the retired-list of the Navy."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be amended to correspond with the body of the bill; and Senate bill 367, on the same subject, will be indefinitely postponed.

JABEZ BURCHARD.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 570, Order of Business 71.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 570) for the relief of Jabez Burchard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the allowance to Jabez Burchard, assistant-engineer on the retired-list of the Navy, an amount which, with payments heretofore made to him, will be equal to 75 per cent. of the sea-pay of the grade or rank held by him at the date of his retirement by a naval board.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report in that case?

Mr. CAMERON. There is a report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is not at the desk.

Mr. CAMERON. Here is the report. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, January 20, 1886:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 570) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

This bill having been fully and thoroughly considered by this committee during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, the report then made by the committee to the Senate is herewith adopted and made part of this report.

[Senate Report No. 156, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 738) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

A bill for the relief of Jabez Burchard passed the Senate at its last session, and a bill for his relief passed the House Committee on Naval Affairs also at the last session of Congress, but was not reached on the Calendar of the House, containing several thousand bills.

The bill, as now introduced, provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow to Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer on the retired-list of the United States Navy, an amount which, with payments heretofore made to him, will be equal to 75 per cent. of the sea-pay of the grade or rank held by him at the date of his retirement by a naval board of the United States Navy; said amount to be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to take effect from and after the date of his retirement by said naval board.

Mr. Burchard entered the United States Navy March 14, 1865, as acting third assistant engineer. He served five months on the monitor Naubuc; was detached and ordered to the United States steamer Powhatan. He served a little over two years and six months on this steamer; was detached and granted one month's leave of absence, and was honorably discharged. He re-entered the Navy September 1, 1870, as second assistant engineer, and was ordered on special duty at League Island, Pennsylvania; detached from there January 11, 1872, and ordered to the United States monitor Terror, at Havana. While attached to this monitor at Key West, Fla., in July, 1872, he was taken with an affection of the eyes, was examined by a board of medical officers, condemned, and sent home. After remaining on sick-leave for nearly a year he reported as fit for duty, and was ordered to join the United States steamer Tuscarora, at San Francisco. After joining this ship he was again attacked with affection of the eyes, and was again condemned by a medical survey and sent home. After his arrival home he placed himself under the treatment of Dr. P. D. Keyser, an eminent oculist, who pronounced his disease to be one of the worst forms of inflammation of the retina. While in this condition he was ordered before the retiring board at Washington, which board decided that he was unfit for duty by reason of disability which did not originate in the line of duty. This decision placed him on the retired-list with the rate of pay of $500 per annum. The report of the medical officers on the retiring board is as follows:

NAVAL RETIRING BOARD, Washington, D. C., October 12, 1874.

SIR: We have examined Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer, United States Navy, and find him affected with chronic retinitis. He had been twice condemned by medical survey of disease for the eyes, and there is no evidence on record that his disability originated in the "line of duty." He is at present unfit for duty, and, in our opinion, is permanently incapacitated to perform the duties appropriate to his commission.

Respectfully, &c.,

GEORGE PECK,
Medical Inspector.
DAVID KINDLEBERGER,
United States Naval Surgeon.

Commodore J. W. NICHOLSON,
President Naval Retiring Board.

Mr. Burchard asserts that when he appeared before the retiring board he was wholly unprepared with essential and necessary proof, such as a certificate from his family physician, who had known him from childhood, and other important testimony, to show that the disease did originate in the service, not deeming it necessary, but that he relied solely upon the merits of his case, which he supposed would be clearly evident from a simple statement of the plain facts of the same.

From a very careful and diligent examination of the papers in this case, your committee are of the opinion that the decision of the retiring board was erroneous and unjust, as will appear from the following certificates from Dr. P. D. Keyser, surgeon at Wills's Eye Hospital, Philadelphia, and Dr. William T. W. Dickeson, the family physician of Mr. Burchard, which show very conclusively that the disease with which he is unfortunately afflicted was contracted in the line of duty while in the service of the United States, and that it was not hereditary.

1630 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA, May 2, 1876.

Mr. Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer, United States Navy, came to me in October, 1873, suffering from a severe attack of retinitis, which has assumed a chronic form.

This affection of the eyes is the result of his duties on monitor service, the great heat and severe changes of light, &c. I can find no signs of any constitutional (acquired or congenital) disease.

He has been under my treatment up to the present date, and is still and always will be incapacitated for any use of his eyes.

P. D. KEYSER, M. D.
Surgeon, Wills Eye Hospital, Philadelphia.

This is to certify that I am personally acquainted with Dr. P. D. Keyser, and know him to be among the first physicians and oculists in this city.

L. G. WUNDER,
Chief Clerk, Philadelphia Post-Office.

I hereby certify that I am acquainted with Dr. P. D. Keyser, a physician in good standing, and further that the foregoing is his certificate.

Witness my hand and official seal this 3d day of May, A. D. 1876.

ROBERT R. SMITH,
Magistrate of Court No. 8, Philadelphia.

MEDIA, PA., May 4, 1876.

I certify that I have known Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer, United States Navy, since he was a child, and can positively assert that there never was any hereditary disease about him; that he was in a sound physical condition on entering the United States service, and had always good eye-sight until sent home from duty on board the monitor Terror.

In his present condition, from chronic retinitis, he is absolutely unable to use his eyes from the painfulness caused by this disease.

WILLIAM T. W. DICKESON, M. D.

DELAWARE COUNTY, ss:

On this 4th day of May, A. D. 1876, personally appeared before me, a notary public of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, residing in said county, William T. W. Dickeson, M. D., who, being duly affirmed according to law, says that the above facts are true as he verily believes.

Affirmed and subscribed before me the day and year above written.

A. P. OTTEY, Notary Public.

From the following letter of the former Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Robeson, to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, it will be seen that it was the opinion of the Navy Department that the disease was incident to the service:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 1, 1877.

SIR: Upon a full review of all the facts in the case of Assistant Engineer Jabez Burchard, United States Navy, the Department is of the opinion that the causes which incapacitated him for active duty were incident to the service, and that he should receive the higher rate of pay allowed to retired officers by section 1588 of the Revised Statutes.

Very respectfully, &c.,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. S. J. W. TABOR,
Fourth Auditor of the Treasury.

The following is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Hon. A. A. Sargent, former chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, which gives a concise history of the whole subject:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 14, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date inquiring, on behalf of the Naval Committee of the Senate, what were the reasons for placing Second Assistant Engineer Jabez Burchard on the retired-list on furlough pay, and why it is now desirable to change his status.

January, 1874, Mr. Burchard was ordered before a retiring board, the finding of which was that he was affected with chronic inflammation of the retina, and was consequently, at the time, unfit for duty, but "not incapacitated within the meaning of the law."

In October, 1874, he was again ordered before the retiring board and found incapacitated for service, and that there was no evidence that the incapacity originated in the line of duty.

The President concurred in opinion with the retiring board, and directed that Second Assistant Engineer Burchard be retired on "furlough pay," and he was so retired.

In 1876 Mr. Burchard appealed to the Secretary of the Navy to examine into his case, which he regarded as one of peculiar hardship, and filed certain papers in support of his claim that his disease originated in the line of duty, and asked that the President be requested to nominate him for transfer from the furlough to the retired pay list.

Copies of these papers are herewith inclosed. The solicitor of the Navy, to whom these papers were referred, reported: "The evidence is so strong as to prove that Burchard's loss of eyesight was caused by exposure in the perform ance of duty, that I respectfully advise that he be nominated for transfer from the furlough to the retired pay list."

No nomination for a transfer was made, but instead thereof the Secretary of the Navy, March 1, 1877, informed the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury that, upon a full review of the case of Mr. Burchard, he was of opinion that the causes which incapacitated him from active duty were incident to the service, and that he should receive the higher rate of pay allowed to retired officers under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes.

It appears that this view was accepted by the Fourth Auditor, and that Mr. Burchard was paid for the time he had been on the retired-list the difference between furlough pay and retired pay.

On the 10th January, 1878, the Second Comptroller called on the Department for a copy of so much of the decision of the retiring board in Mr. Burchard's case as related to the question whether or not the causes were incident to the service, and, it is understood, decided, quite properly it is thought, that Mr. Burchard could only receive the higher pay by transfer, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes, and gave directions to check against him the difference of pay he had received.

As he was getting only "furlough pay," or half of "leave of absence pay"—$500 a year—the checkage of this difference, which he had received, against this small sum of $500 per annum was a peculiar hardship. Mr. Burchard therefore applied to the Department for a recommendation to the President for his nomination from the furlough to the retired pay list.

Under all the circumstances—that is, the probability that Mr. Burchard's disease might have been incident to the service; that the Secretary of the Navy had given him the benefit of this view; that he had received the difference of pay; that a checkage against his small pay of $500 per annum would be peculiarly hard; that he is nearly blind, and was not charged with nor retired for immoral conduct—I consider the case as one calling for my favorable action, and his name was submitted to the President for nomination from the furlough-pay to the retired-pay list.

A copy of the report of the medical officers on the retiring board is herewith inclosed; also a copy of a statement made by Burchard before the board.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. A. SARGENT,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. Burchard was subsequently nominated for the retired-list of the Navy, so that he could lawfully receive 75 per cent. of sea-pay, and he was confirmed by the Senate. He was accordingly transferred from the furlough to the retired pay list April 1, 1878, to take effect from the date of his retirement, October 26, 1876. The Comptroller, however, still adhered to his former decision that Mr. Burchard could not receive that rate of pay without a special law of Congress allowing the same. Hence this bill.

A bill for the relief of Mr. Burchard was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress on the very last day of the session, but failed to receive the final action of that body for want of time. The report submitted by Mr. Frank Jones, on behalf of the committee, at that time, shows that that committee held to the same views in relation to the justice of the bill that your committee do. The report is as follows:

"It appears from evidence furnished from the Navy Department that Assistant Engineer Burchard was retired in October, 1874, on account of defective vision, incapacitating him for active duty, and that a board of officers reported that his disability resulted from injuries received not in the line of duty. He was consequently placed upon furlough pay. In 1876 he appealed to the Secretary of the Navy for a re-examination of his case, and furnished evidence in support of his claim that his disease resulted from injuries received in the line of his duty. The evidence was so strong in support of the fact that Mr. Burchard lost his eye-sight by exposure in the performance of his duty that the Secretary considered it just that he should be transferred from furlough to the retired-list of the Navy, and he ordered the accounting officer of the Treasury to allow him 75 per cent. of the sea-pay of his grade, which he was accordingly paid.

"But a new Comptroller coming into office, ruled, under the opinion given by the Attorney-General, that having been retired by a report of a board of officers, stating that his disability was not the result of injuries incurred in line of duty, he was entitled to but 50 per cent. of sea-pay. Afterward Secretary Thompson, with a view to give him 75 per cent. of sea-pay, recommended that he be nominated for the retired-list of the Navy, and the President so nominated him; and after an examination of all the papers in connection with the case the Senate confirmed the nomination. He was accordingly put on the retired-pay list of the Navy. But the Comptroller still decided that such nomination and confirmation could not give him the 75 per cent. of sea-pay without an act of Congress, and in this decision he was sustained by the Attorney-General. There was therefore no recourse left Mr. Burchard but to appeal to Congress. In his letter to the chairman of the Senate Naval Committee, Secretary Thompson said: 'Under all the circumstances, and considering the probabilities that Mr. Burchard's disease might have been incident to the service; that the Secretary of the Navy had given him the benefit of this view, and that he had received the difference of pay; that a checkage against his small pay of $500 per annum would be peculiarly hard; that he is nearly blind, and was not charged with or retired for immoral conduct, I consider the case as calling for my favorable action, and his name was submitted to the President for transfer from furlough-pay to the retired-pay list.'

"Considering all the facts and circumstances in connection with this case, the committee report favorably thereon, and recommend that the bill ought to pass."

Mr. Burchard is entirely incapacitated from pursuing any avocation that requires the use of his eyes, and is, therefore, debarred from the pursuit of any occupation by which he might earn a sufficient income for his support.

Should the bill recommended by your committee pass, Mr. Burchard will receive pay at the rate of $1,275 per annum, or 75 per cent. of the sea-pay of his grade, his pay at present being $850 per annum, or 50 per cent. of the sea-pay of his grade.

The following statement is incorporated in this report for the information of the Senate, which shows the rate at which Mr. Burchard has been paid since his retirement:

Jabez Burchard retired October 26, 1874, and paid as follows:

From October 26, 1874, to June 30, 1875, at $950 per annum (248 days)		$645 48
From July 1, 1875, to March 31, 1877, at $500 per annum		875 36

		211 92
From July 1, 1878, to September 30, 1878, at $850 per annum		214 25
From October 1, 1878, to December 31, 1878, at $850 per annum		214 25
From January 1, 1879, to March 31, 1879, at $850 per annum		209 59
From April 1, 1879, to June 30, 1879, at $850 per annum		211 92
From July 1, 1879, to September 30, 1879, at $850 per annum		214 25
From October 1, 1879, to December 31, 1879, at $850 per annum		214 25
Paid by certificate April, 1877, difference between 75 per cent. of $1,700 per annum ($1,275) and 50 per cent. of $1,900 per annum ($950) from October 26, 1874, to June 30, 1875		220 82
Difference between $1,275 and $500 per annum from July 1, 1875, to March 31, 1877, inclusive		1,356 79
Paid by certificate April 15, 1879, difference between $500 and $1,270 per annum from February 1, 1878, to March 31, 1878, and amount checked by paymaster first quarter 1878 ($80.43)		205 70

N. B.—This officer received the pay at $1,275, or 75 per cent. of the sea-pay at $1,700 per annum from date of retirement, October 26, 1874, to March 31, 1878. April 1, 1878, it was changed to 50 per cent. of $1,700 ($850), and he is so paid to December 31, 1879, last return in.

Your committee are of opinion that this is a very meritorious case, and one that appeals to the magnanimity and justice of Congress.

The bill is therefore reported favorably, and its passage is earnestly recommended.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that he had, on this day, approved and signed the following bills:

An act (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings; and

An act (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 204, being the bill (S. 276) granting a pension to Philip C. Enders.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator from Wisconsin enlarge his motion, so as to take up pension cases favorably reported on the Calendar?

Mr. SEWELL. Commencing with the preceding case, Order of Business 203.

Mr. SAWYER. Very well, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator change his motion so that the pending pension cases be taken up in their order?

Mr. SAWYER. Yes, sir; those favorably reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the pension cases favorably reported shall be taken up in their order and considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Pension bills favorably reported from the Committee on Pensions will be considered in their order.

Mr. SEWELL. I think the first case is the one preceding the one called up by the Senator from Wisconsin, Order of Business 203.

MARGARET A. BLAKE.

The bill (S. 359) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Margaret A. Blake, widow of George A. H. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES M'NEIL POTTER.

The bill (H. R. 1625) for the relief of Frances McNeil Potter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to increase the pension of Frances McNeil Potter, daughter of the late General John McNeil, United States Army, from $20 to $30 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. SUSAN GILMAN.

The bill (S. 811) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Gilman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Susan Gilman, widow of Pliny R. Gilman, late of Company E, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NOAH NELSON.

The bill (S. 1125) granting a pension to Noah Nelson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "Noah," to strike out "Davis" and insert "Nelson;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Noah Nelson, late of Company I, Twelfth Indiana Volunteers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET B. HARWOOD.

The bill (S. 284) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Margaret B. Harwood, widow of Rear-Admiral Andrew A. Harwood, late of the United States Navy, at $50 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISS REBECCA MILLER.

The bill (S. 813) granting a pension to Miss Rebecca Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Miss Rebecca Miller, daughter of the late Brigadier-General Miller, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ADALINE M. PUTNAM.

The bill (S. 814) granting a pension to Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam, mother of the late Haldimand Sumner Putnam, late colonel of the Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET A. BLAKE.

The bill (H. R. 2021) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A Senate bill of the same title has been passed. The House bill will now be considered, and the vote by which the Senate bill was passed will be reconsidered, and the bill itself indefinitely postponed instead of passed.

The bill (H. R. 2021) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that the House bill does not fix the rate of pension, whereas the Senate bill does fix the rate.

Mr. SEWELL. Perhaps the House bill should be amended by fixing the rate of pension as the Senate committee fixed it in the other bill. Let it be read, that we may understand its precise terms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House bill will be read again for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Margaret A. Blake, widow of George A. H. Blake, late colonel of the First Cavalry and a brevet brigadier-general in the United States Army, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. SEWELL. That is sufficient to carry $30 a month with it. I ask that the House bill be passed and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 359 has already been indefinitely postponed. The House bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET D. MARCHAND.

The bill (S. 226) granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret D. Marchand, widow of Commodore J. B. Marchand, late of the United States Navy, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM WEBSTER.

The bill (S. 761) granting a pension to William Webster was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of William Webster, late a sergeant of Company I, Twenty-first Missouri Regiment of Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC N. MINSHALL.

The bill (S. 283) granting a pension to Isaac N. Minshall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Isaac N. Minshall, late of Company F, Eleventh Ohio Volunteers, and Company C, Seventy-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, with arrears from the date of disability.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. SEWELL. There is a report in the case. I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PAYNE March 9, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 283) granting a pension to Isaac N. Minshall, with arrears from the date of disability, submit the following report:

The claimant served from June 20, 1861, to June 2, 1864, in Company F, Eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and from September 29, 1864, to July 26, 1865, in Company C, Seventy-fifth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The claimant filed his claim on April 19, 1880, alleging that at Jacksonville, Fla., about June 15, 1865, he contracted a low fever, which resulted in paralysis in January, 1866.

There is no record of any disability in the service, and claimant had no treatment while in the service or after discharge until paralyzed.

The proof shows that claimant was sound and in good health at the time of enlistment, with no predisposition to paralysis.

There is evidence of malarial fever while in the service and at the time of discharge, and of paralysis from January, 1866.

The claim has been several times rejected by the Department, the medical examiners having reported that in their opinion the paralysis was not due to nor connected with any fever contracted in the service.

There is, however, considerable medical testimony tending to show that the paralysis was in some measure the result of fever contracted in the service.

One of the medical witnesses (Dr. Small) testifies that he was called to attend the claimant on January 6, 1866, and found paralysis of the left side, and treated him till March 28, 1866. His opinion is that the paralysis was caused by exposure while in the Army. He says that paralysis could not be the result of fever simply, but that there might be some inflammation accompanying the fever to cause it, and he thinks there was an inflammation of the brain or spinal cord in this case.

Three or four other medical experts give it as their opinion that paralysis might result from malaria or climatic fever.

While the claim was rejected for want of record evidence of alleged fever in the service or at discharge, and for want of satisfactory proof connecting the paralysis with the service, the examiners report the claimant to be in a condition of great hardship.

At the present time the claimant is an inmate of the National Military Home at Dayton, Ohio, and, being afflicted continuously with paralysis he is in a very enfeebled state.

In view of all the circumstances and the conflict of testimony on the part of the medical witnesses, the committee report, recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the last words in the bill, "with arrears from the date of disability."

Mr. SEWELL. I was about to make that motion myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to strike out the words "with arrears from the date of disability."

Mr. SEWELL. I will state in explanation that it was not the intention of the committee that the bill should be reported in that way.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. TIBBETS.

The bill (S. 135) granting a pension to Mary A. Tibbets was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary A. Tibbets, mother of Edward I. Tibbets, late a private in Company K, Eighty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT D. FORT.

The bill (H. R. 1319) to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort, formerly a member of Capt. Richard Benson's company of Tennessee militia, who was in the military service in the year 1814, to $40 per month, in lieu of the pension of $8 per month he is now receiving.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON March 10, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1319) to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort, having examined the same, respectfully report:

That the claimant was a soldier of the war of 1812; was honorably discharged after faithfully and efficiently performing his duties during said war. He was pensioned under the act of 1871. He is now blind, at the advanced age of ninety-one years, and very poor. His wife is eighty-one years of age, and is also totally blind and helpless. They have two sons, who are poor and with large families dependent upon them, and they are unable to assist in the support of their aged parents. In the opinion of your committee this aged soldier should under the circumstances receive additional bounty from the Government which he faithfully served, and they accordingly recommend the passage of the House bill for his relief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

The bill (S. 674) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Mitchell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell, widow of Maj. William G. Mitchell, assistant adjutant-general, United States Army, brevet colonel and brigadier-general, to $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM BLANCHARD.

The bill (S. 1363) granting a pension to William Blanchard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of William Blanchard, late a corporal of Company D, Sixth Vermont Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JENNETTE S. KENT.

The bill (S. 231) granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the word "Kent," to strike out "G" and insert "S," and in line 7 to strike out "private" and insert "corporal;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jennette S. Kent, dependent mother of James S. Kent, late a corporal in Company G, Second Regiment of United States Sharpshooters.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORENCE MURRAY.

The bill (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs an increase of the pension of Florence Murray, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Alexander Murray, from thirty to fifty dollars a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. E. A. BENHAM.

The bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. E. A. Benham, wife of the late General Henry W. Benham, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill that was before the Senate yesterday morning to increase the efficiency of the Army, I intended to call up this morning, and I came up here for the reason that I wanted to get it postponed, because I am not well enough to go into any debate this morning. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it be made the special order for Monday morning.

Mr. BLAIR. During the morning hour?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. It is Senate bill 777.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that Senate bill 777, which was under considertion in the morning hour yesterday, be made the special order during the morning hour on Monday. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

PENSION OF SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1886, Order of Business 347.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 1886) for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR March 16, 1886:

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 1886, being an original bill, the passage of which is recommended by the committee, entitled as follows: "A bill for the relief of soldiers of the late war honorably discharged after six months' service, who are disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and of dependent parents of soldiers who died in the service or from disabilities contracted therein," the passage of which is recommended by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator from New Hampshire ought not to ask in the short remaining time we have here the consideration of a bill of this importance with such a report as that giving us no facts and no data and no general information, but simply a naked recommendation, and when this bill was only reported from the committee on the 16th, two days ago, and I doubt if any Senator outside of the Committee on Pensions has even read the bill. I did not know myself it was on the Calendar. I think it is rather placing us and himself at a disadvantage to ask that the bill shall now be considered. I hope the Senator will consent without any objection that the bill shall be deferred until some time next week when it can be called up. I think we shall not have time in the fifteen minutes left to-day to discuss a bill of this importance or to consider it and understand exactly what we are doing.

Mr. BLAIR. This is a portion of a measure which has been before the country for several Congresses. It is a portion of a bill which was passed by the Senate during the last Congress after very full discussion. It contains certain sections of what is known as the Mexican pension bill with the amendments made in the Senate. So the subject is one with which the honorable Senator from Missouri is entirely familiar, as are most of the Senators composing this body. It is now well along in the session. All these pension projects have been thoroughly considered and discussed, and I certainly do not see any reason why the Senator should complain that no very elaborate report from the committee is made since it is a unanimous one, as far as I know at least. Besides all that, it is a measure with which the Senate is familiar and upon the discussion of which we may well enter, even if we do not conclude it at this time. I did not suppose there would be any occasion for much discussion. I do not propose to enter into any. If the Senator from Missouri desires to be heard I hope he will proceed or any others who have anything to say about it, and if we do not get through to-day I propose to call it up soon and press it as fast as I may upon the attention of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me a moment for the passage of a bill?

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose, if the design is to use up the time until 2 o'clock——

Mr. VAN WYCK. This will take but a few moments.

Mr. BLAIR. There are but a few moments left.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is a bill which is reported unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BLAIR. Is a pension bill to be postponed for these bills?

Mr. VAN WYCK. This will elicit no discussion and no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations.

DUTIES OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that upon the committee of conference appointed on the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was placed a member, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who does not appear to be present in the Senate to-day. I ask that the committee may be filled by substituting some other name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will take the place of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] on the committee of conference.

Mr. BECK. I have engagements on committees which detain me, and I suggest that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], who is a member of the Finance Committee, is not engaged and I am.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], then, will be placed upon the conference committee if there be no objection.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1886.

HON. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate:

SIR: I have received a resolution adopted by the Senate in executive session February 24, 1886——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will withhold the communication at present.

Mr. PLATT. I inquire whether it is marked "executive" or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not marked "executive."

Mr. PLATT. Then I submit it belongs to the Senate in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will feel bound to submit the matter to the Senate in executive session.

Senate bill 1886, which was called up by the Senator from New Hampshire, is before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. What has become of that document?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document has been withheld because on examination it was found to be an executive document. It was not so marked, and therefore the Chair was having it laid before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it were not marked "confidential" I suppose——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That must be determined by the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Regular order!

PENSIONS OF SOLDIERS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1886, which has been read, is before the Senate. There being but five minutes to 2 o'clock, the Chair suggests whether it had not better remain as unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. It can not occupy that position, as I understand, in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no such thing as unfinished business of the morning hour, and therefore it will gain no advantage by being left undisposed of.

Mr. BLAIR. I know that, but I hoped the bill would be disposed of this morning. I am not sure yet that we can not do that. There has been artifice resorted to to use up ten or fifteen minutes that might be devoted to its discussion. I ask for the regular order and that the rules of the Senate may be enforced, which will give us about three minutes more.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the regular order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is speaking upon the bill which is before the Senate. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I yield only that the consideration of this bill may proceed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I appealed to the Senator from New Hampshire a moment ago to allow the passage of a bill——

Mr. BLAIR. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor upon the pension bill which is pending.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir, and I was making a suggestion to the Senate on the pension bill. I was saying that I asked the Senator from New Hampshire a moment ago to consent to the passage of a bill which would be unopposed at this time, but he very much preferred to exhaust ten or fifteen minutes on the pending bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me——

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator is out of order. I decline to yield. I am doing about what the Senator wants, though he does not know it, at this moment of time.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have the floor on the pending bill. There are some points in the pending bill that the Senator from New Hampshire does not seem to understand, and I was going for a few moments, not to give him a little information, but to state some points that it would be well for the Senator to understand.

I desire that the pending bill shall receive proper consideration at the hands of the Senate. To do so I think it is incumbent that the Committee on Pensions, of which the Senator and myself are members, and understand the effect of this bill, should seek to do justice to other measures and other interests on this floor; and therefore in the interest of this bill it was exceedingly impolitic, in my judgment, to thrust it into the morning hour, which is supposed to be given to the consideration of bills that provoke no discussion. It is now the pending bill for consideration, and when it shall have passed away from the consideration of the Senate this morning, then I want the Senator from New Hampshire to understand that hereafter the Calendar will be commenced at the beginning and continued to the end of each morning, unless there is to be a proper treatment indulged in by one member of the Senate to another and from one measure to another.

Mr. ALLISON. "Unless the Senate otherwise orders."

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senate order otherwise, very well; but we have not been proceeding by order of the Senate, but by the mere desire of individual Senators. This morning unanimous consent was given that we proceed with bills of a special class that had been unanimously and favorably reported by a committee. They were considered and we passed to the end of them, with the expectation and understanding that other bills which received no opposition should also be taken up in their course and receive the same treatment and consideration which the pension bills had received. Therefore it would have been proper—no, I will not say proper—it would have been courteous to other interests and to other Senators that when those pension bills had received the approbation of the Senate and passed into laws at least an intimation should have been given that it was not proposed to consider a measure which would bluff all other bills out.

The pending bill can receive the consideration of the Senate upon one day's notice. There is no difficulty about that. It can be put where it should be and where it can be fully considered after 2 o'clock has been reached on any day——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair——

Mr. VAN WYCK. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire is satisfied.

Mr. BLAIR. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Resolutions expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of January 25, 1886, as in violation of his official duty, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me to give a notice? I tried to get the floor to call up Order of Business 191, being the bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. I now give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider it at the conclusion of the morning business on Monday next.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary, February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I regret that even in the heat of debate I should have occupied so much of the Senate's time as I find I have done, and I proceed with the discussion on my part this morning under the promise of brevity.

When I yielded the floor yesterday I had called to the attention of the Senate many acts from 1820 down to the present passed in the exercise of this power to regulate the tenure, &c., as to offices created by Congress.

Now a few words as to the circumstances under which the tenure-of-office act was passed and as to the men who passed it. Senators on the other side are constantly referring to a legislative exposition of 1789 in which the Senate was a tie and the majority in favor of their contention very small indeed in the House of Representatives. They choose to ignore in the debate the legislative exposition of later times. The tenure-of-office act was passed in 1867. It was passed, it is said, in the midst of great party excitement. So it was; but every measure from 1861 down to 1867 could be abrogated or held in abeyance upon the same pretense.

Those years were the distressful years of war and blood and the exciting, anxious, turbulent opening years of reconstruction. The Congress of the United States from 1861 down to 1867, and later even, passed every act which it passed in time of excitement, but the tenure-of-office act received the careful consideration of Congress. It was passed after discussion in both Houses. Men were here, and able men, on the Democratic side to present the same arguments against its passage that Senators to-day present in favor of its being violated or held to have been repealed without express repeal; but the Congress of the United States saw fit to pass it. The President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, saw fit to veto it, as he had a right to do. He presented to the Senate the same arguments against it in his veto message which have been presented on this floor during this debate, the force and effect of the legislative exposition of 1789 and the decision in Ex parte Hennen. Every argument and every point was exhausted in that veto message, and the Senate, with the argument before it in solemn and official form from the President, saw fit to pass the act, and the President says in his message that it was passed by a Congress "determined upon the subjugation of the Executive to legislative will."

One may safely appeal to the history of the time and to the character of the men who passed it in reply to that method of attack upon this law. May I read the names of the Senators who voted to pass the bill of 1867 against the veto of the President? Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler of Michigan, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden of Maine, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes of Iowa, Harris, Henderson, Howard of Michigan, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, Yates.

Many of those men were long since borne to "the lone couch of everlasting sleep," but no man can call the roll of American statesmen and have it complete without most of these names. William Pitt Fessenden, of Maine, a great lawyer, a wise legislator, a patriot and a man upon whom constitutional obligations did not rest lightly, a man who saw fit, even at the expense of popularity in his own party, to vote against the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, who had done so much and suffered so much for pure principle sake, Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, Chandler of Michigan, Grimes of Iowa, Howe of my own State, a man of stainless life, profound thought, and strong convictions—and their associates—these were the men who during all the years of the war had wisely, calmly, constitutionally stood at the helm, by Lincoln and the Army and Navy, that the Government might be preserved; these were the partisans who a little later enacted the legislation under which, thank God, every State is represented to-day in the Senate of the United States. Is no weight to be given to that practical legislative exposition of the Constitution? Is that act to be impeached by the suggestion from the President of the United States, that it was passed in violation of law, in breach of constitutional duty, by a partisan Congress to bring under the yoke a duly-elected Executive? The first name on the roll of the other House is the name of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and if you read through the list you find there the names of men who stand the embodiment in this country of what is true and strong and wise in legislation and in statesmanship. If this country has in its legislative history any jewels worth keeping, they are many of the names recorded in favor of that measure.

But, sir, the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act ought to be considered in this country at least as res adjudicata, and that without reference to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Under it, as it was passed in 1867, the House of Representatives saw fit in the exercise of a power devolved upon it by the Constitution to present articles of impeachment against the then President, Andrew Johnson. Eight out of the eleven articles of impeachment were for violation of the tenure-of-office act. The managers, I think every one of them, discussed its constitutionality with elaboration. The gentlemen who represented the President upon that great occasion, chief among whom was the Senator from New York who sits before me, whose fame as a great lawyer ceased many years ago to be only national [Mr. EVARTS], discussed its constitutionality. The Senate of the United States sitting as a high court of impeachment, under the sanction of an added oath, considered and decided the question. Thirty-five Senators, I think it was, most of them able lawyers, deliberately prepared opinions intended to place upon the record their judgment, and the grounds of their judgment, are recorded as in favor of the constitutionality of that act, and three who voted for acquittal, Fessenden, Trumbull, and Henderson, regarded the act as constitutional, but voted upon other grounds. Yet we are told to-day again, and a hundred years from now the same thing will doubtless be asserted if there is party necessity for it, that under the Constitution the President is supreme, absolute in his power of removal, beyond the reach of Congress, because in 1789 by a tie in the Senate and a small majority in the House, and upon the basis of the debate then had, there was a legislative exposition that way.

But it may safely be said that when Andrew Johnson passed out of office and General Grant came into office as president the partisan feeling alleged to have existed in 1867 had passed away and more quiet, more peaceful times had come. General Grant in the flush of victory, loved by the American people then as his memory is loved by the American people now, clothed by the suffrages of the people with the functions and power of President, deemed by the people under the providence of God the chief savior of the Republic, was not satisfied with the act of 1867. He manifested a clear desire at the outset of his administration that it should be taken from his way. The Senate stood like a rock against it. There was upon the question of its constitutionality as well as upon the question of its expediency a debate almost unexampled for ability and research. The House of Representatives yielded promptly to the request for its repeal. The Senate, not laboring under excitement then, was unwilling to yield it.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, in reporting the bill, had said of it in 1867:

> The committee have recommended the adoption of this rule respecting the tenure of offices as a permanent and systematic, and, as they believed, an appropriate regulation of the Government for all administrations and for all time.

I shall trouble the Senate by reading for but a moment from that debate. Mr. Morton, of Indiana, who has been quoted so many times on the other side in this debate as opposed to the tenure-of-office act, was not opposed to it on constitutional grounds. He argued that it was impracticable, just as did Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio; but Mr. Morton said, on page 89 of the RECORD:

> Mr. President, I believe the tenure-of-office law is constitutional. I have never entertained serious doubts upon that question. The power of removal in the hands of the President may be limited, it may be regulated, but in the absence of that limit and in the absence of that regulation, it may be exercised by the President as it was for seventy-eight years.

Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, who was bitterly opposed to the act on grounds of expediency, said of its constitutionality:

> I was not opposed to it because I believed it to be unconstitutional. On the contrary, I had the impression, and I have it still, that the Congress might impose upon the President, in the administration of that particular duty, the restrictions that that act did impose.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, who has been quoted so freely by the gentlemen on the other side for some purpose, I do not precisely know what, had this to say as to its constitutionality:

> One question at least has been settled by the recent legislation of Congress, and that is the power of Congress to regulate removals from office. This has been settled not only by the impeachment trial, but by the repeated action of both Houses, acquiesced in now by all the departments of the Government. The power of removal is not a constitutional but a legal power. The Constitution does not confer the power of removal upon the President or upon the Senate, or upon both, or upon any other branch of the Government, but leaves that, with a great variety of other powers, to be regulated and controlled by law. When the Constitution is silent the law prevails.

Among others who took part in the debate in 1869 was a Senator from my own State, Mr. Carpenter, regretted by all the people of Wisconsin. He was accounted by the courts, high and low, and by the bar of the United States to be a great constitutional lawyer, and the echoes of his silvery voice still linger, a pleasant memory, about this Chamber. In an able argument he defended the constitutionality of the act. May we not consider the question rightly settled until the courts shall have held otherwise?

If I have spoken to any purpose whatever it has been to show among other things that under the law as it stands the President has no power to remove an officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate except by and with the advice and of consent the Senate; that he may suspend at his discretion within the limits of the act, and that when he nominates to the Senate a person to fill a vacancy the only question for the Senate to determine is, Is the nominee a fit and competent man to discharge the duties of the office? If the Senate think

(and they are entitled to full information from the Executive upon that subject) him a proper man, he is to be confirmed.

When a nomination is sent to the Senate to take the place of a suspended official, the question first to be decided then by the Senate is, Shall we advise and consent that the suspension by the President shall ripen into a removal? Shall we advise and consent to the removal of the man from office? And upon this question it is likewise entitled to full information from the Executive; and this being determined in the affirmative, the question occurs, Do we advise and consent to the appointment of the person whose name is sent to the Senate?

Possessing, therefore, the right to call for papers and information from the executive department of the Government necessary to enable the Senate to discharge with fidelity and intelligence its duty under the law in the matter of removals, it can not forego that right when in its opinion its exercise is necessary.

It can not suffer, by its acquiescence, the principle as to papers, now asserted by the executive department, to grow into precedent. It is not a question of etiquette, nor is it a question of politics. It is very far above either.

The Senate has no right to trench upon the prerogative or powers of the Executive. The maintenance, sacred and inviolate, of the prerogatives of the three great co-ordinate departments of the system under which we live, as the fathers framed it, is essential to the permanency and success of our Government. Neither should be permitted to trench upon the other, and neither may permit any impairment, through aggression or concession, of its constitutional faculties and prerogatives.

The Senate can not yield the principle that in any case or under any circumstances the files of the Departments, evidencing the conduct of public offices, shall be secret from the inspection, or that any paper or letter bearing upon the conduct of a public office, placed upon the files of any Department, or in custody of any executive officer, and which ought to be placed upon the files of any Department, can, at the will of anybody, even though it be the President, become personal and subject to removal or destruction.

The Republican majority in the Senate is bound, too, by every consideration of justice, to exercise this right for information as to all nominations sent to it by the President, where, in its opinion, it is necessary in order to protect the good name of suspended officials, whom the Senate is invited to unite in removing from office.

And this brings me to a few words as to the cause of this controversy, and the responsibility for it—a line of remark political, not legal, but justified and called for by the suggestions upon the subject in the debate and in the President's message.

We are living under a Democratic administration. I regret it, as a Republican, but it is a fact.

When Mr. Cleveland entered upon the office of President he found Republicans filling the offices of the country.

I think I may safely say that the people of the United States expected, as soon as it might be done with due regard to the public business, that Republicans would be replaced by Democrats. I think it was expected that the verdict of the people at the last national election would be construed into a desire for a change in the offices of the country.

I have thought there were two courses, and two only, fairly open to President Cleveland as to the distribution of offices not included within the scope of the civil-service law.

I do not, in what I have to say upon this subject, question his desire to give the people a good government, nor do I impute to him a purpose, or even a willingness, to import into the administration methods which are neither fair nor manly; but, nevertheless, they have come.

It was open to the President to adopt the policy that no man with a fixed term of office should be removed from that office until the term expired, if he had been faithful and true to the trusts with which he was clothed and so continued to be. This course, if found to meet popular approval, would have compelled every succeeding administration to follow the example. No man would have been removable for cause, except for a cause which, under any administration, ought to work a removal.

Or he might have adopted the policy of filling the offices, as far as he and his party advisers might deem it consistent with the transaction of the public business, with new men of his own political faith, believing in the principles of his party.

Either policy would have been defensible upon principle.

I admit that much is to be said in favor of leaving faithful men in office during their terms. Much likewise I think is to be said in justification of a policy that changes in the offices with change of the administration is in the interest of the people, and that an administration has a right to use as its instrumentalities political friends instead of political enemies, for I assume that in this country men in office as well as men out of office will belong and ought to belong actively and openly to one party or the other.

I know I am not considered orthodox upon this subject from the extreme civil-service standpoint.

I think an administration which must be by one political party or the other would better serve the people in the end, all things considered, if it took to itself the sole responsibility of administration rather than to divide the responsibility as in a sense it does by continuing in the offices throughout the country men appointed by an administration of a different political faith.

I am not unmindful of the fact that this is termed the spoils system, and that he who even admits it to be in the slightest degree defensible is by many patriotic men denounced as a spoilsman. I deny that it is justly to be termed a "spoils" system. It is not, in my view, a distribution of offices as a matter of spoils, but a natural incident to the change in administration from one political party to another.

No one will pretend that any man should be permitted to hold an office for which he is unfit, either by reason of want of capacity or want of integrity, because of any great party service he may have rendered. But the offices throughout the country are not, as a rule, offices requiring peculiar training. Citizens are abundant everywhere, in every community, in each party, competent in every way to discharge the functions of most of the offices without previous experience in them.

It is said, "divorce the offices from politics." Why? What is there about politics, except in a few great cities where men combine for local plunder, that should be so offensive and dangerous? I know it is said that there is danger that the change of offices with change of administration will debauch the politics of the country, and that the political campaigns will be turned into a scramble for office, and the people will lose sight of principle. This is not a new suggestion. It is one of the unfulfilled prophecies of 1826 and 1835.

At the last election there were 10,480,000 votes cast. How impossible that such a people, governing themselves, can be led, as a people, from contests for principle to contests for office?

There is not a man on the other side of this Chamber, I venture to say, who is not a partisan leader in his State. There is hardly a Senator on either side of this Chamber who has not again and again, year in and year out, had occasion to address the people in his State and in other States upon political issues. Did it ever occur to you, when you stood facing American citizens by the thousand in a heated political campaign, they listening to every word you uttered, that they had any thought about the offices; that they lost sight for a moment of the principles at issue between the two parties; that the inspiration of their cheers, the interest which flushed their faces and brightened their eyes, was the contemplation of office-holding? Not at all. There is no such danger to the American people.

You say that we have had for the last twenty-four years in this country this partisanship which corrupts the service and tends to debauch the people. Have we? The Republican party may confidently challenge to their administration the investigation and attention and criticism of the world. The records show, as I understand it, that while the expenditures of public money year after year increased, while the army of officials grew, the percentage of loss in disbursements and collections diminished. I hope the party now in power will do as well.

The President saw fit to adopt neither policy upon the subject. Either would have been manly, definite, and defensible, and there was no fair middle ground between them.

Mr. Cleveland early, and before he was inducted into office, attempted to formulate in his letter to Mr. Curtis the policy which was to govern his administration of public affairs so far as the offices were concerned. He said:

> That practical reform in the civil service is demanded is adundantly established by the fact that the statute referred to in your communication to secure such result had been passed in Congress with the assent of both political parties, and by the further fact that a sentiment is generally prevalent among patriotic people calling for a fair and honest enforcement of the law which has been thus enacted.
> I regard myself pledged to this, because my conception of the true Democratic faith and public duty requires that this and all other statutes should be in good faith and without evasion enforced, and because in the many utterances made prior to my election as President, approved by the party to which I belong, and which I have no disposition to disclaim, I have in effect promised the people that this should be done.

Here he gave or renewed his promise to enforce the civil-service statute. I am not here to-day to suggest that he did not intend to enforce it, nor do I suggest that he has not tried to enforce it in good faith, nor do I make any attack upon that statute. On the contrary, I am in favor of it. It is wise and beneficent, and that it is a genuine reform has been abundantly demonstrated. I am willing to extend its provisions, but I think it neither practicable nor wise to attempt to extend it to the great body of office-holders who discharge their duties in the midst of the people.

The controversy between the President and the Senate in no wise relates to his administration of this statute. Any statement to the contrary is misleading.

Not content with pledging himself to carry out the civil-service law, which had been passed, as he says, with the assent of both parties, and which every one in the country expected him to carry out, because they knew he must when he took the oath of office swear to carry it out, Mr. Cleveland continued:

> There is a class of Government positions which are not within the letter of civil-service statute, but which are so disconnected with the policy of an administration that removals therefrom of present incumbents, in my opinion, should not be made during the terms for which they are appointed solely on partisan grounds, and for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power.

Am I mistaken in the opinion that this language was generally and justly construed as a declaration by the newly-elected President to the country that men of fixed term at least, who had been and continued to be faithful in the discharge of public duty, would continue, independent of party considerations, in office until the expirations of their terms?

I have believed, and still believe, that thousands of Republican office-holders would have resigned but for this proclamation.

Mr. Cleveland continued:

> But many now holding positions have forfeited all just claim to retention, because they have used their places for party purposes in disregard of their duty to the people, and because, instead of being decent public servants, they have proved themselves offensive partisans and unscrupulous manipulators of local party management.

This language, not only by its own force but in view of what preceded it, means more than mere partisanship; it means more than offensive partisanship, as defined later by the administration. I know of no one who thinks a person should be retained in a public office by any administration who prostitutes his place to party purposes and becomes an "unscrupulous manipulator" of party management. A man of honor may well object, with bitterness and indignation, to being convicted upon such an indictment and suspended without a hearing.

Then came the circular of the Postmaster-General, which, while intended for limited operation and for a special purpose, came to the public, and is understood to have been more generally acted upon than was at first proposed. The gentleman whose name is signed to this circular is my personal friend. He was a gallant soldier, and would not willingly do an unmanly thing; but I think I hazard nothing in the remark that this circular calling for charges, challenging the activity of informers, has not commended itself to the fair-minded men of either party as an improved method of administration. It was probably the best possible device whereby the difficult performance could be accomplished of keeping men in office who had faithfully discharged the duties of the office, and yet turning out for political reasons men who had faithfully discharged the duties of the office. I can not forbear to enter my protest against the philosophy of this circular.

I hope no Republican will be induced to lodge a complaint against any Democratic office-holder upon the grounds stated in it, and I should dislike, although I might do it, to vote to confirm a Democrat to an office, who will take it upon the condition laid down in this circular—that he will abdicate the functions of an American citizen, will not be an active editor or proprietor of a newspaper printing offensive articles, or a stump speaker, or a member of a political committee, or officer of a campaign, &c. The American people have demanded no such thing and I trust will demand no such thing of its office-holders. I should dislike to see the principle of this circular, as a whole, brought permanently into the administration of affairs. Better at once embalm and lay away, if possible, every office-holder until the end of his term, and let his wife or some other political non-combatant discharge the duties of the office. Honest partisanship is honest citizenship. There is more danger of our citizens caring too little than too much for politics.

There have been sent to the Senate over six hundred and forty nominations in place of Republican officials suspended. From the letter of the President we have a right to assume that not one of these men has been suspended solely because of partisanship. From the circular of the Postmaster-General we have a right to assume that many of them have been suspended for partisanship, and that of a very inoffensive kind.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] said that doubtless very many of those who have been suspended have been suspended "for political reasons." Doubtless some have been suspended for causes affecting their personal and official honor. Is it not a matter of vital interest to each one of these suspended officials to know under which class his case falls—whether he has been suspended upon a charge which if true involves a stain upon his character or only upon the charge of having been too active a Republican?

Upon what principle is the Senate of the United States invited to advise and consent to the removal of these suspended officials and at the same time denied all knowledge and information, though upon the files of the Departments, as to their conduct in office?

A suspended official writes me from Wisconsin a letter, in which he says:

> I do not want the office. I have discharged, as far as I could, faithfully its duties, but I want to know whether any charge has been made against me affecting my official character. If I have been removed for political reasons I make no complaint. If I have been charged with anything affecting my honor I want to know it and to be heard upon it.

Is this an unreasonable request for an American citizen to address to a Senator from his State? Is it not out of harmony with the American sense of fair play that such a request should be denied? Is a system under which a suspension is brought about, which makes secret and beyond the reach not only of those affected by it, but of the Senate, the ground therefor, entitled to public approval?

Another man who writes me a letter of the same purport I have known for twenty years. He was suspended upon a charge of the nature of which he is not informed. He is an honorable, high-minded gentleman; was a faithful official, so far as I know or he knows. He was a soldier who stood in the shock of battle in defense of the Union, not once, but many times. Can I, as a Senator, advise and consent that the suspension shall become a removal, in enforced ignorance as to his conduct in office? Would you feel at liberty, Mr. President (Mr. CALL in the chair), to advise and consent to a removal in such a case if the suspended officer were of your own political faith, from your own State, and appealed to you not to retain him in office, but to protect his name? I ask any Democratic Senator if he would be willing to do it?

A letter comes to me from the Indiana city in which I was born, as to one suspended from office upon charges, I am advised. This man was pointed out to me in my boyhood as one who entered the Mexican war in his young manhood as a drummer, and who, throwing away his drum on the field of battle, did the part of a soldier, with musket in hand, and fought his way up to the grade of an officer. This man entered the Army in 1861, and rose from the position of captain, by faithful service, long continued, in many battles, under our flag, to be a major-general. Can I advise and consent, as a Senator, to his removal from office, not knowing whether the charges against him involve personal dishonor? Is that the way for us to conduct our part of the people's business? These cases are illustrations of very many.

If we have, as I insist, a clear right to be advised of the conduct in office of the suspended official, could there be any higher reason for insisting upon that right than that thereby we are enabled to protect the character of good men?

Certainly there was no design in the methods which have been adopted, or in the course which the President has taken in resisting the demand by the Senate for information, to perpetrate any wrong upon the character of citizens; but that such is the effect there can be little doubt.

Men who are suspended from office upon charges affecting their character are entitled, upon every principle of fair play, to know what those charges are, and to meet them. They are also entitled to know whether they are suspended upon such charges or not.

When are these papers, now secret, to be revealed? When, and by whom, is the injunction of secrecy to be removed from them? May they not later come out into the daylight to taint the memory and torture the family of some man who has passed away from earth, and who might have answered them could he have known their purport?

The people too have a peculiar right to know, and to know fully, the conduct of public officers. That, of all things, should not be kept confidential. The removal from office of an unfaithful servant is but the slightest punishment for his delinquencies. His greater and more adequate punishment is found in the finger of scorn, always pointed at one guilty of a betrayal of a public trust. Such publicity also protects the people against the danger of restoring, through ignorance, an unworthy man to public office.

Is not every legal reason and every public interest in favor of the position of the Senate in this controversy?

You must not tell us that we are struggling with the President to keep Republican officials in office. That is in no sense true. If there be a Senator upon this side who has either such desire or purpose I have not met him. We expect you to take the offices, and we only ask that they be taken in an open, manly way.

The success of a national administration is a matter of great popular interest. Any one who for party purposes would desire its failure would be too narrow and mean a partisan to be a good citizen. I do not wish to see it embarrassed or obstructed in any right course. I will not help to do that, nor, I think, will any Senator on this side help to do that. I am willing to resolve every doubt, consistent with fair treatment to the citizen, in favor of the administration in this matter, and I hope the way may be open to us; but I for one can not, under my oath as a Senator, yield what I deem to be the right of the Senate to inspect papers touching the conduct of office by a suspended official, when in its judgment it is for any reason essential to intelligent action upon the subject of a removal; nor am I willing to blindly participate in an act of removal when I have reason to think I shall thereby, as a Senator, join in placing a stain upon the name of an innocent man, unheard.

Mr. President, it is due to myself to say that I have proceeded with great embarrassment, from illness, with my remarks.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a short time. I am fully satisfied that I can utter no word and make no suggestion which will strengthen the arguments which have been presented on this side of the Chamber in support of the position assumed by the minority of the Judiciary Committee and the President of the United States, but I can not consent that my position in reference to this question, which has occupied so much of the time of the session and which has been, as I think——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALL in the chair). The Senator from Delaware will suspend. There is too much noise on the floor and in the galleries.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg to say that if I can have the attention of the Chair and of a few of my friends immediately around me, I do not care for the attention especially of the galleries.

I was proceeding to say that I could not consent that my support of the position of the President of the United States, believed to be in perfect accord with his constitutional rights, and so ruthlessly assailed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee and by the speeches made upon the other side, should rest simply upon a silent vote.

I do not expect to give my approval to all the measures favored by the present administration as enunciated in the annual message of the President; I do not expect to give my advice and consent to all the nominations which he may send to the Senate; but in a question where the President of the United States stands squarely upon his constitutional rights, endeavoring to defend the dignity and character of the office to which he has been elevated by the people of this country, it gives me pleasure to support him in the maintenance of his constitutional rights, and from which he is sought to be driven by his political enemies.

The Senator who was last upon the floor [Mr. SPOONER] assumed and declared that this controversy has been thrust upon the Senate by the President of the United States. Sir, the President of the United States has sought no controversy with the Senate. He was well aware that his administration could be interrupted and embarrassed by a hostile Republican Senate, and he had every inducement to keep himself in harmony as far as possible with the majority of the Senate, who would have to pass upon his nominations. Therefore the assertion that the President of the United States has thrust this controversy upon the country and upon the Senate is wholly without foundation. The President has done no such thing. But the contention has been brought here by the Republican side of the Chamber, and more especially by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

What are the facts? President Cleveland was elected by his countrymen to the chief executive office in the fall of 1884. He entered upon the discharge of that office a little more than a year ago. He came into office finding at least 95 per cent. of the offices filled by his political enemies. Common justice would have said that at once there should have been an abdication of a least one-half the offices by the men who held them, so that the President might adjust the offices between the different political parties of the country. But no resignations, or very few, were tendered from any of the officers of this country. However, the President proceeded cautiously. Unused to the exercise of power, the administration proceeded with a caution and forbearance that is unparalleled in the history of administrations; and when we met here in December, or reconvened the first of the present year, the President had sent to the Senate but six hundred and forty-three removals of Presidential officers subject to Presidential control out of from fifteen thousand to seventeen thousand subject to his control. I say that such magnanimity toward political opponents has not been exercised by any administration for the last fifty years.

Sir, you heard the other day, and no man has questioned it, that President Grant in seven weeks after he came into office had removed six hundred and eighty officers; and yet President Cleveland removed but six hundred and forty-three in the first eight months of his Presidential term. What then was done by the Senate? Let us see who is responsible for this controversy. The nominations in cases of suspensions and removals sent here by President Cleveland have been before the Senate for three months, and yet they have been suffered to slumber in the committee-rooms of this Senate or to remain unnoticed upon the Executive Calendar. Why has that been done? Because the Republican side of the Chamber set itself to work deliberately, premeditatedly, I will not say with malice aforethought, to see if they could devise some scheme by which they could forestall the President and prevent the removal of their partisan friends from office. It is because of the action of the Republican side of this Chamber, and more especially because of the action of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, that this controversy to-day is before the country, that this controversy is here in the Senate obstructing the regular performance of the duties devolving upon the Senate in the confirmation of appointments to office.

Mr. President, what was the motive, if we must go into motives? The Senator who preceded me undertook to examine the motives of the President of the United States, and if motives are to be inquired into we may ask what were the purposes of the Republican side of the Chamber and of the Judiciary Committee of this body in thus obstructing the executive business laid before it. There are but three possible reasons: first, to protect their political friends in the places which they now fill; or, secondly, to make some point against the present administration in the hope of returning back into power; or, thirdly, a deliberate purpose of divesting the executive department of the Government of its rightful constitutional powers and investing the Senate with the performance of executive duties with which it has no possible concern.

The Senator who preceded me denies that there is any desire on the part of the Republican side of the Senate to protect the Republican officials now in office. If that is true is it not strange that the nominations of the President remain unacted upon? Is it not strange if such is the case that this controversy has been precipitated by the Republican side of this Chamber, claiming, what has never heretofore been claimed, that they have a right to supervise the removals or suspensions of the President of the United States? In other words, that they have a right to see every private letter, confidential letter, every paper memorandum that has been sent to the President or any head of a Department before they will act.

Sir, I have looked at the report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee, and I do not hesitate to say that while I find appended to that report the names of distinguished Senators, able lawyers, men of high character and standing in the country, a more disingenuous, unfair, unjust presentation of this controvesy never emanated from a committee of any deliberative body. What do they say? I read from the report:

> The important question, then is, whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves.

The President of the United States has said to the Senate that every official document, every official paper, was subject to the inspection and examination of the Senate; and yet this committee says "the question, then is, whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves." The controversy is because the President will not deliver to the Senate unofficial papers, private papers, confidential papers, not that he will not deliver official papers. So there is an attempt to impose on the country by a false presentation of the question at issue, and the committee has not done justice to the President or justice to the people of the country or to itself in the deliberate statement it has made.

The Judiciary Committee, in order to sustain the views which they present in this document, have copied at great length a report made by Garrett Davis in 1842 in the House of Representatives, and yet they took special care not to state that Garrett Davis, upon the floor of the Senate at a subsequent period, twenty-five years thereafter, had openly and publicly repudiated his utterance of the sentiments which he had embodied in that report, and fail to present to the Senate so that the Senate might know just what were the views of Mr. Garrett Davis, whose report was introduced with commendation. Let us see what Mr. Garrett Davis said on that subject, and I submit whether it would not have been fair and proper in the Judiciary Committee when they undertook to influence the action of this body by the presentation of a report of Garrett Davis to state that Mr. Davis had subsequently repudiated his own conclusions, and that therefore they must both be taken together. Here is what Mr. Garrett Davis said in the Senate on the 29th of March, 1869:

> Some twenty-five years ago I adopted the opinion that the power of removal belonged jointly to the President and the Senate as a sequence from the power of appointment; but subsequent and through examination of the subject has convinced me that I was in error; and the experiment of the civil-office-tenure bill has demonstrated the evils and impracticability of the President and the Senate conjointly executing this power, and vindicated the wisdom of the founders of our Government in confiding it exclusively to him.

I submit that this alone would corroborate what I have said, that a more unfair and more unjust presentation of the question at issue between the President and the Republican side of this Chamber never was embodied in any report that emanated from any committee of this body.

What is the question? The question is whether the President of the United States shall abdicate a power conferred upon him by the Constitution—the power of removal—and subordinate his high office to the supervision and control of the Senate of the United States. That is the question; and as an excuse for assuming that position the Judiciary Committee of this body and the Republican side of this Chamber claim the right to inspect the private papers of the President of the United States, not the official papers, not the public documents, all of which are accessible to any committee of this body or to any Senator in this body who sees proper to call for them, as we are informed by the special message of the President himself.

But now, sir, why should they want to look into private papers sent to the President? Of what earthly value could they be? Doubtless there is in every Department of the Government an accumulation of letters signed by people from every part of the country in reference to public officers, some asking to have an office given to them, some asking that their friends may be appointed to office, some saying that a certain man, perhaps, has not discharged his duties faithfully. I do not know their contents; I am left to imagination, for I have never had the curiosity to delve among the letters that are filed away in some dark recess, some basement story of some Department of this Government, but I am left to imagination—I suppose that there are letters of this description, some of them marked "confidential," some of them and a large number of them have never been read by the President of the United States or by any head of any Department of this Government. The fact that the President does not see proper to place those letters at the disposal of the Republican side of this Chamber is made the excuse for not confirming the appointments sent here by the President. That is made the excuse, but the true purpose and animus is to assume jurisdiction and a supervisory control by the Senate of the United States over the executive powers belonging to the President.

Recurring to the question of whether one purpose of this dilatory and obstructive policy pursued is to protect in office the Republican incumbents, let me ask why is it if gentlemen are so anxious, as they claim, that Republicans should abdicate the offices and resign, that they do not advise them to do so? Why is it that they take special pains to delay the confirmation of men whose names are sent here to supersede Republican officials? No, sir; this question has been forced on the President. I assert here and now that he can not, with a decent regard to the high trust reposed in him, comply with the unlawful demands of the Senate and abdicate his own powers and subject his power of removal to the supervision of the Senate of the United States.

I shall not go into any discussion of the tenure-of-office act. I hold that that act is unconstitutional. I hold that the power resides in the President of the United States, by the Constitution itself, to make removals from office, and that every attempt now or heretofore made to limit and control the exercise of his power of removal, conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States, must ex necessitate be unconstitutional; and I do not hesitate to say that if I were President of the United States I would so treat it. When Andrew Johnson was President of the United States, for whom the tenure-of-office act was made, and over whom it was held in terrorem, he tried to make an issue in the courts, and his Republican opponents attempted to impeach him—filed articles of impeachment against him. He was under their power, and two-thirds of the House of Representatives and of the Senate were his political enemies. I believe he had the courage, if he had not known that the forces marshaled against him were sufficient to oust him from his office, to have disregarded the tenure-of-office act. Mr. Cleveland has not attempted to disregard it, but has sent suspensions here in conformity to the act of 1869; but in doing that he has not abdicated the functions of his office, nor can he divest the executive office, if he were to try, of its constitutional powers given to it by the Constitution. So far as he is individually concerned he might waive the exercise of a constitutional prerogative in deference to a statute made by Congress, but he can not divest the office itself of its constitutional functions.

This question of constitutional power has been debated almost ad nauseam. I shall not myself enter into the discussion of it at any great length, but I desire to cite some authorities which have not been cited in this debate, bearing on the subject. I shall repeat no authority that I understand has been presented by anybody else in this Chamber.

Let me say that the Constitution invests the President of the United States with all executive power, subject to certain provisions, wherein he must consult the Senate in reference to appointments and in relation to the making of treaties; and it is his duty also, under the Constitution, to see that the laws are faithfully executed. This investiture of the executive office with executive powers is inherent in the office, and can not be divested from it except by constitutional amendment. No statute that Congress can make, no resolution that it can pass, no attempt to infringe upon the constitutional rights belonging to the President, can itself be valid.

This question was early settled, as has already been stated, in the first Congress that met after the Constitution was adopted. In that Congress were men who had participated in the formation of the Constitution, who had sat in the convention that made the Constitution, who had instructed the people of the country as to its import. They sat in the two Houses of Congress in 1789, and they passed upon this question deliberately after full and mature discussion. I shall not cite the debates because they have already been cited. But I want to quote what Mr. Marshall, in his Life of Washington, said about that declaration of the meaning of the Constitution, because I understand it has not been cited in this debate. I cite it for two purposes; first, to show that this power is inherent, by the terms of the Constitution, in the executive office; and, second, to exclude the idea that it was a power conferred by Congress at that time. As this authority has not been cited, I will read more fully than I should otherwise do what Mr. Marshall says on the subject:

> In organizing the departments of the executive, the question in what manner the high officers who filled them should be removable came on to be discussed. Believing that the decision of this question would materially influence the character of the new government, the members supported their respective opinions with a degree of earnestness proportioned to the importance they attributed to the measure. In a Committee of the Whole House on the bill "to establish an Executive Department to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs," Mr. White moved to strike out the clause which declared the Secretary to be removable by the President. The power of removal, where no express provision existed, was, he said, in the nature of things, incidental to that of appointment. And as the Senate was, by the Constitution, associated with the President in making appointments, that body must, in the same degree, participate in the power of removing from office.
> Mr. White was supported by Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, Mr. Page, Mr. Stone, and Mr. Jackson.
> Those gentlemen contended that the clause was either unnecessary or improper. If the Constitution gave the power to the President, a repetition of the grant in an act of Congress was nugatory: if the Constitution did not give it, the attempt to confer it by law was improper. If it belonged conjointly to the President and Senate, the House of Representatives should not attempt to abridge the constitutional prerogative of the other branch of the Legislature. However this might be, they were clearly of opinion that it was not placed in the President alone. In the power over all the executive officers which the bill proposed to confer upon the President, the most alarming dangers to liberty were perceived. It was in the nature of monarchical prerogative, and would convert them into the mere tools and creatures of his will. A dependence so servile on one individual would deter men of high and honorable minds from engaging in the public service; and if, contrary to expectation, such men should be brought into office, they would be reduced to the necessity of sacrificing every principle of independence to the will of the Chief Magistrate, or of exposing themselves to the disgrace of being removed from office, and that too at a time when it might be no longer in their power to engage in other pursuits.
> By the friends of the original bill, the amendment was opposed with arguments of great force drawn from the Constitution and from general convenience. On several parts of the Constitution, and especially on that which vests the executive power in the President, they relied confidently to support the position, that, in conformity with that instrument, the power in question could reside only with the Chief Magistrate; no power, it was said, could be more completely executive in its nature than that of removal from office.
> But if it was a case on which the Constitution was silent, the clearest principles of political expediency required that neither branch of the Legislature should participate in it.
>
> The danger that a President could ever be found who would remove good men from office was treated as imaginary. It was not by the splendor attached to the character of the present Chief Magistrate alone that this opinion was to be defended. It was founded on the structure of the office. The man in whose favor a majority of the people of this continent would unite, had probability, at least, in favor of his principles; in addition to which the public odium that would inevitably attach to such conduct would be an effectual security against it.
> After an ardent discussion, which consumed several days, the committee divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 34 to 20. The opinion thus expressed by the House of Representatives did not explicitly convey their sense of the Constitution.

Now mark:

> Indeed, the express grant of the power to the President rather implied a right in the Legislature to give or withhold it at their discretion. To obviate any misunderstanding of the principle on which the question has been decided, Mr. Benson moved in the House, when the report of the Committee of the Whole was taken up, to amend the second clause in the bill so as clearly to imply the power of removal to be solely in the President. He gave notice that if he should succeed in this he would move to strike out the words which had been the subject of debate. If those words continued, he said, the power of removal by the President might hereafter appear to be exercised by virtue of a legislative grant only, and consequently be subjected to legislative instability, when he was well satisfied in his own mind that it was by fair construction fixed in the Constitution. The motion was seconded by Mr. Madison, and both amendments were adopted. As the bill passed into a law it has ever been considered as a full expression of the sense of the Legislature on this important part of the American Constitution.

That is what John Marshall said in reference to the declaration by the Congress of 1789. But the question has been before the courts, and it has been decided in court that the provision of the Constitution conferring executive power on the President and requiring him to see that the laws be faithfully executed, was an investiture of the office with absolute control over officers, rendering them subject to removal at the executive pleasure.

I cite a Pennsylvania case, 5 Sergeant and Rawle's Reports, where this question came up in 1820. It came up under the constitution of Pennsylvania, which is identical in terms with the Constitution of the United States, investing the President with executive power and requiring him to see that the laws are faithfully executed. I want also to say that this opinion was delivered by as able a judge as ever sat upon an American bench, Chief-Justice Tilghman, and his associates were John B. Gibson and Thomas Duncan. So far as Judge Tilghman and Judge Gibson are concerned, the profession everywhere in this country recognize that there were no abler judges that ever sat upon an American bench, not even the Supreme Court of the United States has had abler men upon it than these two Pennsylvania judges. I will not take time to do more than state the case as narrated in the opinion of the court. A party had held an office under some particular statute, but in 1790 the State changed her constitution and invested the governor with executive power. He removed the incumbent of the office and appointed another. The old incumbent took the case to the courts, and claimed that the governor could not remove him from the office. The supreme court of Pennsylvania, after hearing the case, which was ably argued on one side by the two Ingersolls, J. R. Ingersoll and C. J. Ingersoll, and on the other side by J. Sergeant, after reviewing the arguments and stating the case, proceed to say:

> It is, therefore, the opinion of the court, without doubt, that by our present Constitution the power of appointment is vested in the governor.
> 2. But, granting the power of appointment to be in the governor, it is denied that he has the power of removal. This denial is founded on two reasons: 1. That the constitution does not give the governor the power of removal, even in cases where he has the express power of appointment. 2. That the tenure of this office is during good behavior.
> As to the tenure of ministerial offices in general, there can be no doubt but it is during the pleasure, unless the law by which the office is established order it otherwise. This is not a new question. It engaged the attention of the Congress of the United States, soon after the formation of the Federal Constitution, by which the President nominates and appoints, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. There was some plausibility in the argument, that the tenure of officers should be at the pleasure of the President and Senate, because the President could not appoint without the consent of the Senate; and the Constitution is silent as to the power of removal. Yet, it was determined, with general approbation, that the pleasure of the President was the tenure of office. A main reason for this was, that the President, being vested with the supreme executive power, was bound to carry the laws into operation, which can only be done through the intervention of officers. If these officers are not removable at his pleasure, he is relieved from that responsibility to which it is for the public good to hold him. An officer is not appointed for his own sake, but for that of the public. If he misbehaves, the sooner he is removed the better, because the country suffers every moment that he continues in office.

So that the legislative construction of 1789 of the constitutional provision is affirmed by a decision made, as I before remarked, by as high a court as any judicial tribunal that ever sat in any State of this Union.

This question has been before the Senate at various times since 1789. It came up in 1822; it came up more especially and emphatically in 1830, and from that to 1835, during the administration of President Jackson. It will be remembered that President Jackson removed the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Duane, and appointed the late Chief-Justice Taney as Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Duane had refused to comply with the President's request or demand that he should remove the public deposits from the United States Bank at Philadelphia, and President Jackson, without consulting the Senate, removed the Secretary of the Treasury and appointed another. His power to do so was not questioned then by the Senate. The Senate, I believe, confirmed Mr. Taney, and he removed the deposits. Then when Congress met the Whigs of that day opposed to General Jackson attempted to find fault with his action, both in regard to the removal of Duane and the removal of the deposits. They first attempted to see if they could not frame some attack upon the administration for the removal of Duane, but they ultimately changed their course and attacked the administration of General Jackson for the removal of the deposits, and that matter was discussed during the rest of the Presidential term of General Jackson, and it occurred before his re-election. The people sustained General Jackson; he was re-elected to office, but the Whig opposition attacked him in every point, and I believe that it was after his re-election that the resolutions, which were finally expunged, were passed declaring that his act was in derogation of the Constitution and the laws.

This question came up again more emphatically, and to which I wish to refer now because it has not been referred to in this debate, in 1856. There are members of the Senate who remember that controversy perhaps. In 1855, during the administration of President Pierce, the Congress of the United States heard complaints of the inefficiency of the naval officers of the country, and passed a law authorizing the creation of a board to inquire into the efficiency of the naval officers, and to make report to the Secretary of the Navy. That board was composed of fifteen distinguished naval officers. They examined into the efficiency and qualifications and fitness for service of all the officers of the Navy, and they recommended the retirement of some one hundred and fifty or two hundred naval officers, some of whom had contracted habits of dissipation, some of whom were deemed disqualified by age for the service, and by the action of the President they were placed on the retired-list or dropped from the rolls—some of them, I believe, were dropped and some of them were placed on the retired-list, to the number of about one hundred and fifty.

The consequence was that from every State in this Union the friends of the naval officers who had been dropped were clamoring for a redress of grievances and sent their petitions to the Senate, sent their petitions to the other House of Congress at the session which met in December, 1855, asking that some remedy be applied to this wholesale retirement of naval officers. The question was introduced in December, 1855, and continued the prominent question before the Senate up to July, 1856. In that debate no man took a more prominent part than a distinguished member of this body from my own State, Mr. John M. Clayton. I need not tell the Senate who Mr. Clayton was. I need not tell the Senate that he was able to cope with the ablest men in this Chamber in debate. He measured swords with the most formidable and the strongest men in this body; and I say here and now from a careful examination of his discussion upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that he presented stronger arguments, more conclusive demonstrations of the justice and the propriety of that treaty than were presented on the other side by Mr. Cass and Mr. Douglas, or any of the men who debated that question. Mr. Clayton discussed this question of removal, and I want to introduce his view of the question, because not only of his high character but also because his opinions on that subject have not been presented in this debate. I quote first from his speech made in this Chamber February 18, 1856.

Let me say that the board of naval officers which had recommended the retirement and dropping of so many naval officers was severely attacked, but in all this debate I have not been able to find a single utterance of any man against the power of the President to remove those officers from the Navy-rolls or to place them on the retired-list. Mr. Clayton was brought so prominently into this debate, because Captain, afterward Admiral, Du Pont was a member of that board, and, I believe, its president. Mr. Clayton was interested in that great officer, and no man could ever assail a prominent citizen of Delaware while Mr. Clayton was upon this floor without his coming forward to his defense; and that fact made him prominent in this debate, because his friend and a citizen of his own State was assailed most violently in the debate. But I say again, from what examination I have been able to give to that discussion, the power of the President to remove even naval officers or civil officers or military officers was not called in question. I now proceed to read from the speech of Mr. Clayton, made in February, 1856:

It is well enough always when you go about a thing to look to what you have power to do. I do not see how we can afford redress in the manner which gentlemen have suggested. I have stood on this floor, as my friend from Georgia and other friends here well know, many long years ago, contending against the extension of executive power—contending that there was too much of it in the country—and particularly in reference to removals from office. But the practice of the Government is settled; the commission of every officer, naval, military, or civil, runs during the pleasure of the President. He can make and unmake; and it is in vain for us to say that he has not the power. We may complain of the exercise of it; we may believe there has been an abuse of it. If you choose to go to the extent which Mr. Madison said you might go, in the debates of 1789, you can have him impeached by the other House, and this body can try him; but there is no other remedy. You can not reverse the action of the Executive. You have but the remedy pointed out by the framers of the Constitution in 1789, and no other.

Sir, if a strong case were presented where a man had been wronged under this law, where I myself was convinced that he had been wronged (and I trust I shall always be open to conviction), I should seek for some means of redress, and I should not be contented until I had found some, if it be possible, but I am utterly unprepared to say what that means would be. I should inquire diligently of others if they could not find some mode in which we could do justice, inasmuch as we had been in some degree, however small, accessory to the injustice. For myself, I should be in favor of restoring the officer, if we could do it by unanimously applying to the President to put him back. If that could not be done, I should seek some mode of indemnifying him for the wrong. I can not presume that wrong has been committed; I can not undertake to say that this, that, or the other man was injured by the action of the board until I have proof of the fact.

There is the opinion of Mr. Clayton in 1856—and he had served in the Senate at various times from 1829—that the power of removal belonged exclusively to the President of the United States under the Constitution of the country. This question continued before the Senate and Mr. Clayton delivered another elaborate speech in the month of July following on the same subject, and I want to read an extract from that speech:

But if I have a settled opinion on any subject, it is fixed that the President of the United States, untrammeled of Congress, has the exclusive power of removing public officers from both the Army and the Navy. That I have understood to be the fixed law of this country ab urbe condita, and it is bottomed upon more than one hundred thousand precedents—for there have been more than one hundred thousand commissions, civil, military, and naval, issued, every one of which bears on its face that the incumbent of the office holds it during the pleasure of the President. Is it not astonishing that if the construction now put on the Constitution be correct, George Washington never discovered it? He was the first man who ever issued one of these commissions, and every commission issued during his administration was, in the language of your law, during the pleasure of the President. So, too, of Thomas Jefferson. I think he knew something about the Constitution. So, too, of James Madison; and every President you have ever had has issued his commissions in the same terms; and it is vain to attempt to get up a distinction between the Army and Navy and civilians. They are all removable at the will of the President. I do not go into the discussion so far as relates to the various cases already alluded to and others that might be cited; but I desire now, in order to put the fact on record, to allude to one circumstance that occurred during my public life which I believe has never got into the public debates or the public prints.

I remember the time well when the Senate was agitated upon the great question of the removal of the deposits. I remember the celebrated resolutions of Mr. Clay, which were afterward condemned and expunged by order of the Senate. I remember well that one of the leading resolutions introduced by that distinguished gentleman at that day directly declared against the removing power of the President, in the case of the dismissal of William J. Duane, who had refused to remove the deposits. The subject was discussed from week to week, from month to month, and at last it came to a vote. Now, mark what occurred then. Not a single Whig Senator in the Senate voted to sustain Mr. Clay in the resolution which he had introduced. Not a single man of them, besides himself, would agree to support the proposition which he laid down, that the President had not the removing power. What was the result? I was present at a consultation behind your chair, sir, when John Tyler and myself insisted on his changing the resolution, and you will find, by referring back to the debates of the day, that he did change his resolution at the suggestion and entreaty of his friends. I was one of them.

But the resolution as it stood and was adopted by the Senate was drawn not by Henry Clay, but by John Tyler, who is now alive and will prove the fact. The resolutions, as passed, did not deny the removing power of the President; they only denied the legality of the "late executive proceedings." That was the language of the resolutions. They declared those proceedings to be in derogation of the Constitution and the law. They attacked the removal of the deposits; they attacked the specie circular; but they left every man free to vote on them without committing himself to this question, which not a single Whig in the Senate besides Mr. Clay was willing to do. I refer back to this circumstance because I have personally a fresh recollection of it, and the record will confirm what I have stated. I say that although those were high party times, and although at that day there was an anxious disposition to condemn the action of the President for the removal of William J. Duane, if it could be done as a constitutional act, there could not be found on the floor of the Senate a single Whig Senator besides Mr. Clay who would agree to do it.

That is from a speech made July 15, 1856, as reported in the Congressional Globe. That was not the only speech which Mr. Clayton made on the subject. I find one in the Appendix to the Globe of the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress. I quote this because from my knowledge of Mr. Clayton I know the value of his opinion on any proposition and because his opinion has not heretofore been adduced in this debate. This is the speech published in the Globe of March 31, 1856:

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, in the whole course of my experience as a member of this body I do not recollect the discussion of any question in the course of which so many Senators have so often departed from the great landmarks and fundamental principles of our Government as in that now before us. I came into the Senate on the 4th of March, 1829, when President Jackson was first inaugurated, and at the succeeding session of 1829-'30 the great question which agitated this body was in relation to the President's power of removal. I was one of those who were then called National Republicans, afterward denominated Whigs. A large majority of the Senate at that time was composed of gentlemen then called Jackson men, who some time after assumed the name of Democrats. On our side of the Senate, some of us undertook to question the removing power. At first there were some—but very few—who denied the existence of such a power. I was one of these who exerted themselves to the utmost to find some mode of restraining the exercise of this power. I entertained then, and do yet entertain, abhorrence of the tyranny extended to the victims of political warfare.

In a speech on the resolution of Mr. Foote in 1830 I denounced this tyranny, and throughout that and succeeding sessions of Congress I labored not only to discountenance and condemn it, but to restrict the practical application of the power within the limits of what I then held to be the spirit of the Constitution, but I did not, and could not, deny the existence of the power, and I will venture now to say that by recurring to the debates of that day there can not be found more than one or two instances in which any Senator ventured to deny the existence of the power in the President. On that occasion, representing a party of men who held themselves to be greatly aggrieved by the hundreds and thousands of removals from office which the President made—sensitive for the very reasons which have been stated to-day by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Iverson] in relation to the character of those who were removed, we sought for any and every measure which we thought could be constitutionally resorted to as a means of redress. We proposed, as you will find by looking to the Journals of that period, resolutions inquiring into the causes of the removal of persons who had been ejected from office, and we desired the determination of the propriety of each removal before the Senate acted on the nominations which were made by the President.

So that the tactics of our Republican friends are not new in this Chamber.

We discussed the question at length. You will find by looking back to the history of that period that Mr. Barton, of Missouri, introduced such resolutions as I have mentioned, and discussed them with great ability. You will find that, in every instance when the question was moved, the Democratic party, then called the Jackson party, unanimously voted down every resolution denying or calling for the reasons of executive removals. By referring to the debates of that day you will find that every debater on the Democratic or Jackson side of the Senate denied utterly the power of the Senate to look behind the nominations and inquire into the causes of removal. Such, I repeat, was not my opinion. I say again, I endeavored at the time to vindicate the opposite position, but I was voted down. The party with which I was associated was always beaten upon that question. We were voted down at every succeeding session whenever the question was raised, throughout the whole of my Congressional career; and there never was an instance in which it was decided that the Senate of the United States had authority to limit or control the removing power of the Executive.

The result was that, as a majority of the sovereign States of the Union held that doctrine for twenty-five years or more, I at last acquiesced in what I could not prevent, and was forced to succumb to the views of the majority. All my political friends finally yielded and gave up the point, considering that the voice of the people of the United States had sustained our opponents on the whole matter in difference between us. We finally abandoned, not by any public recantation, but by our silence, resistance to the removing power, as a point of political controversy; and hence, for many years past, you have scarcely heard a word on this topic in the Halls of Congress.

Ever since the days of General Jackson each successive President had exercised this power of removal without question from any quarter whatever. He has exercised it in every instance without control, without record, without trial, and without giving notice to the party accused. No man has contended for years past that a person removed from office had a right to demand from the Executive of this country the reason for which he was removed, or might require a trial before he was removed, or the production of a record to show the grounds for his removal, or that notice should be given him, and that he should be heard anywhere in regard to the removal. We had in vain denounced the tyranny of the proscriptive policy, and we yielded, however reluctantly, to the popular will.

Just what Mr. Clayton said, in reference to what the commissions bore on their face, that they were held at "the pleasure of the President," is true of naval commissions. I have not looked into civil commissions or into military commissions, but I did take the pains to go to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and I find that the commissions to-day bear upon their face that they hold their offices at "the pleasure of the President." Whether this is true of civil officers I do not know, for I have not examined the commissions; whether it is true of military commissions I do not know, but after the action of 1789, during the administration of President Washington, the formula of commissions was adopted in conformity with the declaration of the Congress of 1789 that removals were at the pleasure of the President, and the commissions to the naval officers at least indicate that that has been the judgment of the country from that day to this, for the commissions have not been altered.

I am aware that there was some legislation in 1865 in reference to removals of military or naval officers unless on the judgment of courts-martial. That relieves the executive department no doubt just as it relieved President Pierce in 1855 to have the report of a retiring board in order that he might exercise his constitutional function of removing naval officers. So the President, in regard to military commissions, retains the power of removal inherent in his office, and it is not affected by the legislation of 1866 in reference to military officers, nor by the action of Congress in 1867 in reference to the tenure-of-office act. The constitutional power still inheres in the President, though he may think it proper to follow the statutory provisions in the exercise of his inherent power of removal, in conformity with the wishes of Congress, but it is nevertheless true that legislation has not deprived him of his constitutional function of removal from civil office.

Mr. President, the existence of political parties in this country is, I had almost said, absolutely necessary to the proper administration of public affairs; perhaps in all governments opposition parties are essential to the proper administration of government, and it is especially true in this country. The minority party can exercise a most salutary influence upon the action of the majority, and our Republican friends on the other side of this Chamber occupy a position to-day where they can render valuable service to the country. If, properly appreciating their position, they follow in proper paths, they can exert the most salutary and beneficial influence on the administration of public affairs. I recall the position of the Democratic party, to which I belong, when I first came to the Senate. We were but few. When I took my seat there were but eight Democratic Senators on this floor holding over. When I came in we were a body of thirteen, but I remember that we made war upon what we conceived oppressive measures of the majority, how we restricted their appropriations of the public money by holding up to public gaze the extravagance of the Republican majority, having then a majority in this House of two-thirds or three-fourths, and a majority in the other House, and possessing the Executive Departments. I became so infatuated with the minority position that I confess I have never felt a very great anxiety to be in the majority in the administration of Government.

As I say, that feeble minority of Democrats at that day did exert a most salutary influence upon the legislation of Congress in restraining the excesses of the Republican majority in this Chamber and in the other House. So I say our Republican friends on the other side of the Chamber, if they would rise up to the dignity of their true position, if they would abandon all obstructive processes, all factious processes, and act as sentinels and guards over the public interests of this country, they could restrain any improper tendency on the part of the Executive or of the Democratic majority in the House to excess in the appropriations or in the extravagant use of the public money for any purpose, as well as excesses in other matters, by resistance and exposure of improper measures before the country.

But, let me say that while such is the proud position which the other side of this Chamber ought to occupy, its position to-day as demonstrated by its action in reference to this question is that of an obstructive party, hindering the due exercise of the executive powers of this Government, and from the very habit of opposition there is imminent danger that the other side of this Chamber may descend from the high position it ought to occupy down to a mere cabal and faction.

What is the position which the Senate occupies to-day? The time was when great men and great parties met in the Halls of Congress and discussed measures of government and administrative policies; but to-day the Senate is degraded by a scramble for the retention of offices in the Republican party. If some one who in other days had witnessed in the old Chamber the debates in advocacy and opposition on questions of government and policies of administration should appear in these galleries and look down on the attitude of the majority of the Senate in a contest which it has forced upon the President for the inspection of his private papers, with what sadness would he contemplate the change that has taken place. Perhaps retiring with bowed head from a scene so humiliating, he would recall the exclamation, "Thou art the man, but oh! how fallen."

I should be glad to see the Senate relieve itself from the impression which this discussion is calculated to make and resume the high position it ought to occupy, and not degrade itself by seeking to degrade the executive department of the Government.

Mr. COLQUITT. Mr. President, I am conscious that this is a very unpropitious hour to engage the attention of the Senate. The debate has been protracted; it has been conducted with signal ability and great historical research; and it is not unnatural that the patience of the Senate has been wearied, or that the novelty of the subject has been lost to the public. I promise, however, that I shall be very brief in the remarks that I have to make. I shall not follow at length the line of argument or of precedent which has been pursued by others.

The question has been debated so ably, and so many precedents and arguments which have been presented by those who have considered it have related almost entirely to the power of the President to make removals from office, that it seems to me it is hardly necessary to continue the discussion upon that line.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, it is now late, and if it be agreeable to the Senator from Georgia I will move an adjournment, so that he may have the floor for Monday.

Several SENATORS. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. COLQUITT. It will be agreeable to me if I can be heard early on Monday morning. I shall not occupy a great length of time in the discussion. The Senate is wearied, and it is more from regard to their comfort than to my own that I yield to the motion of my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say, if I may by unanimous consent, that while I shall not oppose this adjournment, I hope the Senate will be willing, as the Senator from Delaware says this is such a frivolous matter, to stay and put an end to it on Monday, no matter how long it takes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is some executive business, I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not enough executive business to bother about now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1886.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock m. by Mr. CRISP, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 19, 1886.

SIR: I hereby designate Hon. C. F. CRISP to preside as Speaker pro tempore during this day.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Prayer by Bishop MCTYERE, of Tennessee.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROCEEDS OF SALE OF INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, providing for the use of certain funds, proceeds of Indian reservations, covered into the Treasury under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, for the benefit of the Indians on whose account the same is covered in.

The subject is recommended to the favorable consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 18, 1886.

INDIAN TRAINING SCHOOL, SALEM, OREG.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 16th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, "to authorize the purchase of a tract of land near Salem, Oreg., for the use of the Indian training school."

The subject is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 18, 1886.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. HALE for ten days, on account of important business.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, in pursuance of the rule, laid before the House Senate bills; which were severally referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President and to provide for and regulate the counting of the vote for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon—to the Select Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President.

The bill (S. 182) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

The bill (S. 1127) to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1885, granting a pension to Sarah Hague.

The bill (S. 1405) to provide for the study of the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics, and of their effects upon the human system, in connection with the several divisions of the subject of physiology and hygiene, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and of the District of Columbia and in the Military and Naval Academies and Indian and colored schools in the Territories of the United States—to the Committee on Education.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House certain original papers presented to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Forty-fourth Congress in relation to the bill of the House No. 76, there being no adverse report.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I was not observing on yesterday when the Committee on the Judiciary reported back the bill (H. R. 1119) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. I desire leave to file the views of the minority in opposition to the report of the committee upon that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the minority of the committee will be permitted to file its views, to be printed with the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CORRECTION.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a correction of the RECORD. On page 2498 of the record of the proceedings of this morning I am reported as using this language:

Oh, no Mr. Chairman, I never made any remark about my colleague's "usual proneness to error." I would not think for a moment of making any such general charge.

That is correct as far as it goes; but I also made an explanation of the application which was made of the words "proneness to error," and stated that they were applied by me to the speech of my colleague from Texas which I was then criticising, and not to him personally. In other words, my criticism was on the speech and not on him personally; the former was legitimate, while I think the latter would have been improper.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. In this connection I desire to state that I notice some errors in the printed report of the remarks I made on yesterday. I ask leave to correct these errors, and I also ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas can make any corrections he desires by handing them to the Official Reporters. The gentleman asks leave to extend his remarks on the Indian appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Printing, by unanimous consent reported back the bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations, with an amendment by the Senate, and moved that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In lines 2 and 3, strike out "7,500" and insert "75,000."

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. The bill at it passed the House provided for the printing of 75,000 copies. A typographical error makes it 7,500. The amendment of the Senate is to correct that error. The amount appropriated is the same.

Mr. BRAGG. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a private bill.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

BUSINESS OF FRIDAY EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the sessions on Friday evening may be so modified as to confine the business to a consideration of bills granting pensions and bills to remove political disibilities. There seems to be some apprehension that bills of a different character may be by inadvertence referred to the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and by them reported, and that thereby an imposition might be made on the House. To make the order more specific I ask unanimous consent that the words "granting pensions" may be inserted in the order after the word "bills." I think there can be no objection to that.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the order as it will stand if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills granting pensions, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment to the special order offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 236) to authorize the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges in the Territory of Washington;

A bill (S. 901) to grant to the Astoria and Winnemucca Railway Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses;

A bill (S. 1404) to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square No. 406, of the city of Washington, for the enlargement of the Post-Office Department building and to provide accommodations for the city post-office; and

A bill (S. 1471) to remove the charge of desertion from the rolls and records in the Office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against certain soldiers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This being Friday, the Chair will proceed to call committees for reports on bills of a private nature.

NICHOLAS DAILEY.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3026) removing the charge of desertion from the military record of Nicholas Dailey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS DUNCAN.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4737, a bill (H. R. 6982) for the relief of Thomas Duncan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 4737 was laid on the table.

TWELFTH MICHIGAN VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4057, a bill (H. R. 6983) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry dishonorably discharged under Special Orders, No. 92, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated March 1, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 4057 was laid on the table.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 4661) authorizing the President to appoint to the position he held when mustered out, and, if he deems it advisable, to place on the retired-list William Welsh, late a captain of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry;

A bill (H. R. 4623) to place Hospital Steward Jeremiah Phelan on the retired-list;

A bill (H. R. 3071) for the relief of Albert P. Cunningham;

A bill (H. R. 4239) to remove the charge of desertion from Joseph P. Swope, late a member of Company A, Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. 3913) to remove the charge of desertion against Frank Wempe;

A bill (H. R. 6217) for the removal of the charge of desertion against the record of Eli Haines;

A bill (H. R. 3813) for the relief of Charles B. Pease;

A bill (H. R. 3962) for the relief of Charles Hentz;

A bill (H. R. 4724) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Jacob Smith;

A bill (H. R. 4495) for the relief of Thomas G. Milligan;

A bill (H. R. 2602) for the relief of Ephraim Hess;

A bill (H. R. 4486) for the relief of Charles Davidson;

A bill (H. R. 3745) for the relief of James W. Schaumburg;

A bill (H. R. 5073) to correct the muster-roll of Company B, Twelfth Ohio Infantry, as to the name of Andrew C. Miller, late second lieutenant of said company;

A bill (H. R. 4215) for the relief of Elias Haine; and

A bill (H. R. 3157) for the relief of Charles M. Blake.

On motion of Mr. BRAGG, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 498) for the relief of George T. Dudley, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ERNEST BEECHNER.

Mr. VIELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 20) authorizing the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from the record of private Ernest Beechner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES P. COWENS.

Mr. VIELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 359) for the relief of James P. Cowens; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY A. LITTLE.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 567) granting a pension to Mary A. Little; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADAM GASTON.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 550) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Adam Gaston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALTHEA A. FRASNER.
